SENATE—Thursday, March 26, 1970

The Senate, in executive session, met at 10 o'clock a.m. and was called to order by Hon. WILLIAM B. SPONG, Jr., a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Almighty God, whose glory men beheld in the face of Jesus going about doing good, who came as a servant not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and in the end transformed a cross into an instrument of redemption, help us to understand the fellowship of suffering, that we may have His higher wisdom. Make us to know that resurrection is planted in the foundation of the universe. Keep alive in us the crucifying hope that it is only by losing life we find it again and that it is by dying we live. Be with us as we work this day, go with us when we part, stay with us when we worship, come with us when we return.

In the name of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. Amen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I am most heartened by the Senate passage of S. 1289, a bill to amend the International Travel Act of 1961 to enable us to expand and intensify our efforts to attract foreign visitors to the United States thereby reducing our huge travel deficit of $1.877 billion in our 1968 balance of payments.

Last year the Senate Commerce Committee held hearings which I chaired on the present U.S. efforts to attract foreign visitors. The committee received extensive testimony from members of the U.S. Travel Service, the Department of Commerce, directors of State travel bureaus, and numerous witnesses from private industry. As a result of these hearings several broad areas of agreement emerged and this consensus is reflected in S. 1289, which was reported from the committee with amendments.

S. 1289 provided for a Federal grant program with States, cities, and regional groupings to increase our efforts to attract foreign visitors and improve U.S. host and reception facilities; elevates the Director of U.S. Travel Service to an Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Tourism; increases the authorization level from $4.7 million to $15 million per year for the next 3 fiscal years; extends our eligibility for our tourism development program to all U.S. possessions and territories; and creates Tourism Resources Review Commission to study and make recommendations to the Congress and the President on the future travel needs of citizens of United States and visitors from foreign countries.

Federal efforts to attract foreign visitors began less than a decade ago. The recent hearings showed that intensified efforts are needed if we are to reduce our travel deficit and capitalize on the huge potential for growth of foreign tourism to the United States. S. 1289 will be of invaluable assistance in promoting these goals.

If no such repairs, adjustments or replacements are made within a period to be set by the Board, the Board may order the supplier to show cause why the vehicle involved should be eligible for recertification.

At the beginning of line 21, change the section number from "7" to "9"; after the amendment just above stated, strike out "There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. "(b) The Coroner of the District of Columbia may, in his discretion, allow tissue to be removed from any dead human body in his custody or under his jurisdiction, if such tissue removal shall not interfere with other functions of the Office of the Coroner, and the person who, in accordance with section 2(b) of the District of Columbia Anatomical Gift Act, is authorized to donate tissue therefrom, shall first authorize such tissue removal."

(e) Section 683 of the Act of March 8, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 27–125), is amended by deleting "may be removed by or under the supervision of a person licensed under the authority of section 4 of such Act for preservation in a tissue bank operating pursuant to such Act," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "or the District of Columbia Anatomical Gift Act may be removed by or under the supervision of a person licensed under the authority of section 4 of the District of Columbia Tissue Bank Act for preservation in a tissue bank operating pursuant to such Act, or for use in accordance with the provisions of the District of Columbia Anatomical Gift Act,".

(e) Sections 675 and 676 of the Act of March 3, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 27–119a), is amended by inserting immediately after "such Act" the following: "or the District of Columbia Anatomical Gift Act".

Mr. GOODELL. Mr. President, I am extremely pleased that unanimous consent was granted to permit consideration of the pending bill. I ask that it be passed.

On October 7, 1969, I introduced S. 2999, the District of Columbia Anatomical Gift Act, with the cosponsorship of all of the members of the Senate District Committee: Senators BIBLE, EAGLETON, MATHIAS, PROUTY, SPONG, and TYDINGS. On February 4, 1970, I was the chairman of full committee hearings at which a number of physicians and lawyers presented the committee with detailed statements supporting the bill and urging its expeditious passage.

Subsequent to the hearings, the committee received a considerable number of letters from national medical and legal organizations all endorsing the bill and calling for early passage. I am delighted that this legislation has received such prompt consideration by the Senate District Committee and the Senate.

The purpose of this bill is to provide in the District of Columbia a comprehensive and uniform legal framework for organ donation and transplantation consistent with the recommendations of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws made in 1968.

The committee report on S. 2999 has succinctly outlined the need for this legislation, as follows:

NEED FOR LEGISLATION

Laws relating to the disposition of a dead body and to the donation of organs for transplantation are under State jurisdiction, and in the District of Columbia they are enacted by Congress. Existing law on this subject in the District of Columbia is a confusing mixture of the common law—dating back to the 17th century—and numerous statutes governing autopsies, unclaimed bodies, and coroners.

With the success of corneal transplantation and improvements in kidney transplants in the 1950's, some 40 States and the District of Columbia were stimulated to enact some type of legislation giving an individual the authority to donate an organ for medical purposes upon his death. Four other States provided for the donation of eyes only. Nonetheless, it is generally recognized that these individual State statutes are somewhat inadequate and incomplete, and that there is a compelling need to have as much uniformity in the law as possible throughout the country.

With the development of revolutionary advances in the use of organ transplantation, it has become necessary to provide a uniform, favorable legal environment throughout the country for the donation and use of organs and tissue for medical research, education, and therapy.

Although the exact-effectiveness of some of the methods of treatment are not yet determined, there is no doubt that transplantation is one means of medical treatment whose potential has only begun to be explored. Vast experience is being accumulated in surgical techniques and great improvements have been made in tissue matching and the suppression of immune reactions.

Transplantation is now a recognized therapeutic procedure in treating kidney disease, and other tissues which have been successfully transplanted for varying lengths of time include skin, cartilage, bone tendon, nerve, artery heart valve, liver, and lung. Organ donation is not only used in transplantation. Human organs and tissue are required for research into such problems as the cause of cancer.

Nationwide uniformity of the laws governing organ transplantation is necessary in order to further medical advances in this area. The passage of the Uniform Act in 41 States in less than 2 years since the adoption by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is compelling evidence of its need and importance.

Mr. President, Senators will be interested to note that as of March 19, 1970, the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act has been passed in the following States: Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming.

As the committee report points out, the objectives of S. 2999 are to provide—

A simple mechanism for executing the gift after death of the body or parts thereof by persons 18 years of age and older;

A declaration that the donor has absolute priority over anyone who may frustrate such desire following death;

A priority list establishing the line of authority following the decedent for making a donation if the decedent had not indicated his desire;

A protection from liability for medical technicians and surgeons who act in good faith in carrying out the provisions of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act;

A listing of permissible donees, including only those persons or institutions licensed or authorized to practice medicine and to engage in tissue banking and related matters;

A method by which the next of kin may authorize a gift via a telephonic recorded message with the hospital, physician, or institution involved;

A method of revoking a gift should a donor decide to do so after previously having made a decision to donate; and

A reciprocity provision which honors the donation statute of other States.

Mr. President, organ donation and transplantation in the District of Columbia are now provided for by the District of Columbia Human Tissue Bank Act of 1962, as amended. Although comprehensive in certain respects, this statute does not cover many aspects of donation and transplantation which are provided for by the Uniform Act. A significant aspect of S. 2999 is that it contains a model donor card which can be considered a valid form of donation under the bill. This card can be carried by an individual, and will be a valuable means of facilitating the use of organs for transplantation.

This card is currently being distributed throughout the country by a number of medical organizations, including the Eye Banks Association of America, the Falconer Foundation, the Living Bank, Medic Alert, the National Kidney Foundations, National Pituitary Agency, the Tissue Bank of the U.S. Naval Medical School, National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., and the United Health Foundations.

Mr. President, there is tremendous public interest in the use of transplantation as a therapeutic device. With the passage of S. 2999, the residents of the District of Columbia will be covered by a comprehensive statute and the urgently needed nationwide uniformity of law in this area will be further enhanced. It is for these reasons that I ask its favorable passage by the Senate today.

The amendments were agreed to, en bloc.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUTHORIZING EL PASO AND HUDSPETH COUNTIES, TEX., TO BE PLACED IN THE MOUNTAIN STANDARD TIME ZONE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 14289) to permit El Paso and Hudspeth Counties, Tex., to be placed in the mountain standard time zone.

TEXAS' TWO WESTERNMOST COUNTIES SHOULD BE IN MOUNTAIN TIME ZONE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) is necessarily absent today; however, he has a longstanding interest in H.R. 14289, a bill to place El Paso and Hudspeth Counties of Texas in the mountain time zone, and has a statement on the bill.

I ask unanimous consent that Senator YARBOROUGH's statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR YARBOROUGH

Mr. President, I support H.R. 14289 by the Honorable Richard White, a Member of Congress from the 16th District of Texas. The bill will authorize the Secretary of Transportation to place El Paso and Hudspeth Counties in Texas in the Mountain Time Zone upon written request of the county commissioners court of these two counties. For some years these counties have been informally observing mountain time. This bill provides a means by which these two counties can legally be included in this time zone.

El Paso and Hudspeth Counties, Texas, are the two westernmost counties of Texas. Both counties are west of Denver, Colorado, which is in the Mountain Time Zone, and they lie at least 200 miles west of the nearest large population center in Texas. Although all the rest of my State is in the Central Time Zone, I think that by virtue of their location, these two counties are certainly entitled to be placed in the Mountain Time Zone.

Representative White has long been interested in having this proposal enacted, and all of the local officials of these two counties enthusiastically support the measure. On February 18, 1970, I wrote the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. Magnuson), urging the passage of the bill, and I do so again on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter, to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce (Mr. Magnuson), be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

FEBRUARY 18, 1970.

Hon. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Commerce, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There is pending before your Committee, a bill introduced by the Honorable Richard White of Texas, a member of Congress from the western part of my State, to place two westernmost counties permanently on the Mountain Time Zone.

The two counties affected are El Paso and Hudspeth Counties. El Paso County is 1054 square miles in area and had an estimated population of 365,412 in 1969. The largest city is El Paso. Hudspeth County is 4533 square miles in area and had an estimated population in 1969 of 2556.

These two counties are so far west that they fall south of the Mountain Time Zone even though Texas as a whole is a part of the Central Time Zone. The county officials and residents of these counties have annually requested that they be placed in the Mountain Time Zone for reasons of convenience. As I understand it, this bill would simply make this change permanent. In view of these facts, I feel that the change is both wise and warranted.

Because this matter is of great interest to my constituents in these two counties, and because of all I have been able to determine the vast majority of the residents of these counties prefer to be in the Mountain Time Zone, I respectfully request that this bill be considered as promptly as the schedule of your Committee permits.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

RALPH W. YARBOROUGH.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the administrative assistant of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), Douglas Bennett, be entitled to the privilege of the floor today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MUSKIE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) be allowed to proceed for not to exceed 10 minutes, after the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLEANING UP THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, today, more than ever, individual initiative and involvement are a must, if we are to tackle the problem of cleaning up our environment. Government alone cannot purify our streams, decontaminate our air, and reclaim our countryside without the active commitment of every American to join in the task.

I was, therefore, most pleased to receive a letter from a group of seventh graders from Fleetwood, Pa., expressing their desire to participate in a nationwide Clean-Up Day. I applaud and wholeheartedly support their interest and efforts. I ask unanimous consent to have their letter printed in the RECORD as an example for us all.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLEETWOOD, PA.

DEAR SENATOR SCOTT: I am in 7th grade and truly concerned about the pollution in our country. I'd like to know if it would be at all possible to have a National Clean-Up Day? We could even have debates on TV and on radio. It would be worth it. Then, hopefully, more people would be concerned. All people should be, and hopefully, will be, warned about this awful problem. On Clean-Up Day, as well as every day, people should be asked to pick up every bit of litter they see and throw it away.

Sincerely,

KATHRYN F. WOLFORD.

Here are a few names of classmates who are also worried about this problem: Jerry Apgar, Sandy Manwiller, Tracy Seidel, David Johnson, Woodrow Sandey, Merrill Weidner, Carleton Goodheart, Tim Weiss, and John Hainly.

S. 3643—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PRESENT TO CORETTA KING A GOLD MEDAL IN HONOR AND COMMEMORATION OF THE LIFE OF THE REVEREND DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I introduce for myself and Senator EDWARD BROOKE as principal cosponsor, Senators ALLOTT, BIBLE, BURDICK, CASE, COOPER, DODD, DOLE, GOODELL, GRAVEL, HARRIS, HARTKE, KENNEDY, MCINTYRE, MUSKIE, NELSON, PACKWOOD, PELL, PERCY, RANDOLPH, SAXBE, SCHWEIKER, TYDINGS, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, a bill to authorize the President to present, to Coretta King, a gold medal in honor and commemoration of the life of Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. My bill also authorizes the striking of duplicate medals in bronze to be furnished jointly to Morehouse College and the King Family Memorial Center. Each memorial fund will be able to sell quantities of the bronze medal to the public at large.

This legislation is also being introduced today in the House of Representatives by the Honorable MARGARET M. HECKLER of Massachusetts, and the Honorable JOHN CONYERS, Jr., as principal sponsors, with a bipartisan group of Representatives.

Although the medal has not been fully designed, Mrs. Coretta King has expressed her wish that Dr. King's profile and the dates "1929–1968" be placed on the face of the medal, and the words "I Have a Dream" and "Justice-Peace-Brotherhood" be placed on the reverse side.

Dr. King stood for the highest American ideals—equal job opportunity, equal housing, and education—and he worked hard in the interest of both black and white. Americans want to honor Dr. King's memory and want his life story, which is part of our contemporary history, to be preserved. Toward this goal, the bereaved King family established the Martin Luther King, Jr., Memorial Center to preserve memorabilia. Morehouse College, Dr. King's alma mater, established the Martin Luther King, Jr., memorial fund which will provide scholarships for needy students, among other things.

Passage of my bill will help to provide needed financial aid to these two memorials. I urge favorable and immediate action by Congress on this measure.

On Tuesday, March 24, 1970, in 1,000 theaters over the country, a film entitled "King—A Filmed Record From Montgomery to Memphis" was simultaneously shown. The purpose of the film was to help further the sacred memory of Martin Luther King, Jr. In this same spirit, I offer my bill.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SPONG). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3643) to provide for the issuance of a gold medal to the widow of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the furnishing of duplicate medals in bronze to the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial Fund at Morehouse College and the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial Center at Atlanta, Ga., introduced by Mr. SCOTT (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

EVENTS IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in recent weeks, events in Southeast Asia have escalated to a point that, I think, calls for the continued attention of the Senate, as well as the administration.

We know that the Pathet Lao and the North Vietnamese in Laos number, according to the President's figures—and these are North Vietnamese—something on the order of 67,000. They have advanced into and beyond the Plaines des Jarres and are reportedly within 20 miles of the Royal Laotian capital of Luang Prabang.

We know also that as a result of the successes of the Pathet Lao and the North Vietnamese—they are primarily North Vietnamese successes—that an exchange of letters has occurred between Prince Souphanouvong, the leader of the Pathet Lao, and Prince Souvanna Phouma, Prime Minister of the Royal Laotian Government.

The letter sent by Prince Souphanouvong has been received by Prince Souvanna Phouma and, I dare say, that he and his cabinet are looking into the contents with great care at this time.

I assume, also, that what is contained in that letter has been brought to the attention of the U.S. Government and that it, likewise, is giving this matter careful attention.

I would hope, Mr. President, that the situation in Laos could be stabilized through a meeting between the two princes, who are half brothers, for a discussion of the contents of the letter. It is to be hoped that some sort of agreement might be reached which would bring a degree of peace to a very, very peaceful people.

In addition, perhaps the International Control Commission, which is still functioning in Laos, and does maintain contact between the Pathet Lao strongholds at Samneua and Phong Saly, as well as in the territory under the control of the Royal Laotian Government, might be beefed up, that their use as intermediaries would be furthered, and that whatever services they could offer, to bring an end to the difficult situation in Laos, would be forthcoming.

Furthermore, I join wholeheartedly in the plea of the President of the United States to the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, the cochairmen of the Geneva conferees to reconvene that meeting—to me, it is immaterial whether it is the 1962 or the 1954 meeting—for the purpose of trying to bring about a guarantee of the neutrality of Laos which so many of us—14 nations, I believe—agreed to in 1962.

It is quite possible that the situation unless faced up to in this manner, or something approaching it, may well get out of hand.

I would point out to my colleagues that at the present time there is a Chinese-built road extending from Phong Saly, one of the Pathet Lao strongholds, in the northwestern part of Laos through Meng La, in Yunnan, a Chinese province, down to Muong Sai, which in looking at the map I would hazard a guess is probably 20 miles from the border of Burma.

There is another road from Meng La in Yunnan extending southward toward a town called Muong Lo, which would tie up with the road to Dienbienphu in Vietnam. In a southwesterly direction, the road extends from Muong Sai to Muong Houn, and it is within about 30 miles of the Thai border. According to my information, it is still being built.

It is estimated there are 8,000 to 10,000 Chinese along this road, mostly in labor battalions, but with a few antiaircraft battalions as well, for the protection of the Chinese roadbuilders.

All of these factors should be taken into consideration in any discussion of Laos so that the American people will have the facts laid out before them and be aware of just what the potential and possibilities are in that country.

I commend the President for his showing of forbearance. But I disassociate the attacks on the Ho Chi Minh trail which are, in effect, troops of Vietnam and connected with the war in the fighting in other areas of Laos where, I understand, although it cannot be proven, that Thai troops have been involved in seeking to block the extension of the power of the Pathet Lao and Vietnamese.

Then there is the question of Cambodia. Some people seem to be very happy that Prince Sihanouk has been overthrown and is now in Peking where statements attributed to him have been issued of late. It is my understanding that Prince Sihanouk has indicated that as long as he is out of Cambodia, he will divide his time between Peking and Moscow.

I regret to see this form of event, because in my opinion Sihanouk was a very shrewd political leader dedicated to keeping alive the neutrality and the entity of Cambodia. He was able to keep his country in relative peace and stability, as contrasted with the surrounding nations. He did so in most difficult circumstances because he was pressured from all borders, from the west by the Thais, and once in a while by red Khmer Serai units from the north, by the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese, who number something in the order of 45,000 to 50,000 in the northern province of Cambodia stretched out from the east border of Vietnam to the west border of Cambodia at Battambang, which borders on Thailand.

Now we have a deposed prince, living in Moscow, who has been accused of having great sums of money in Swiss banks but the fact is that he has authorized all Swiss banks to disclose the facts to prove or disprove this charge.

He has been accused of a number of other things, but he can never be accused of his lack of dedication to Cambodia and its preservation. Before there is too much rejoicing at his overthrow, it would be well to bear in mind that of all the countries in Indochina, Cambodia under Sihanouk is the only country into which we have not poured billions in aid in recent years and the only country where we have not had Americans fighting and dying during this tragic conflict. What are we to expect now? Aid programs for Cambodia? An extension of military operations into that country? What would this Nation gain from that course?

I am concerned because with the overthrow of Prince Sihanouk and his being established in Peking, a new situation has developed in Southeast Asia as far as Cambodia is concerned. I reiterate that it may well be that we were not too happy with Cambodia's neutrality at times. But it was an area in which a certain degree of stability had been achieved in Southeast Asia.

If events develop to an extent that the present situation brings about an expansion of the war or a civil war in Cambodia, I would hope most devoutly that this Nation would stay out of it and would not intervene in any way in the affairs of Cambodia. That we would not once again fall into the trap of extending aid to one faction and in that way taking the first step toward a new involvement. I would hope, rather, that this Nation would do all in its powers to keep the war from spreading beyond its present limits and thereby prevent a situation which would require an increase in commitment of American forces rather than the phased withdrawal that the President has wisely put into effect up to this time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for yielding at this time.

I think this is the time to make it clear that, as far as I am concerned, I think the distinguished majority leader has correctly and accurately stated a point of view which Americans ought to listen to very carefully and with which I find myself in broad general agreement.

There has been, first of all, a tendency to regard Prince Sihanouk as something of a playboy. Yet, underneath that rotund exterior, there has proven to be a very shrewd manipulator of forces much larger than his own in offering a way to preserve this precarious neutrality for quite a long time.

There is also a tendency, I notice, in discussing the overthrow of Sihanouk to draw the assumption that because those who overthrew him appear to be oriented to the West, that this would necessarily be a good thing for the United States.

It is a broadening of the war and certainly would not be a good thing if it leads to a decision by Peking or Moscow to come into that country. The situation would be much worse, because no matter whether the power which overthrew Sihanouk proves to be oriented to the West or to the East, any power in Cambodia and indeed the whole nation can be overthrown in a matter of hours or days by anyone having the will to do so.

This was the nature of Sihanouk. It required a rather brilliant achievement. He was able to preserve this balance for so long a time. It is too bad that he decided to pack himself off to Peking and Moscow. That will let him in for a lot of travel and travail.

I agree that we were better off when we had him keeping Cambodia neutral.

In my judgment, there is not going to be any expeditionary force in Laos. Neither do I believe there will be any commitment of American ground forces in Cambodia.

I hope we will do nothing to risk the broadening of the war by actions which we take in regard to Cambodia.

I have seen no indication that we intend to run the further risk of broadening that war. I hope we will not. There are American forces close to that border in South Vietnam. They will have to be protected. The interdiction of the Ho Chi Minh Trail will presumably continue. But I do not believe that this administration has any more intention of bringing any ground combat forces into Cambodia than we do of sending them into Laos.

The sooner we get out of the whole embroiled peninsula, the better for all of us.

I am satisfied that the administration is doing everything in its power to accomplish this objective which the American people want.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I agree wholeheartedly with what the distinguished minority leader has just said. I want to assure him that my purpose in speaking today is not to criticize the administration, but to try to be constructive and point out pitfalls and dangers which may arise. I am sure the administration is fully aware of them, but I assume that some comment from the Senate is welcomed.

I am heartened by what the minority leader said, because it indicates that so far as the joint leadership is concerned there is an identity of views. It is unfortunate that so many of our people have tended to look upon Prince Sihanouk as a playboy. He is a man of great ability and great capability, and great energy. He has had to perform a Machiavellian feat in keeping Cambodia independent and neutral since 1953, because Cambodia's independence was achieved even before the Geneva agreements of 1954.

So the purpose of this exchange as the distinguished minority leader pointed out by implication, is that we ought to be extremely careful. We should not be carried away by requests for this or that, not only as far as American personnel are concerned in both Laos and Cambodia, but also as far as American aid is concerned.

We should have learned our lesson and learned it well after what happened in Korea and what has been happening for all too long, for all too many years in South Vietnam. The figures there of what this war has cost us in manpower are appalling. The latest figures I have are as of March 19, less than 1 week ago and they indicate that as of then, last Thursday, 269,719 Americans were wounded in South Vietnam, 40,947 were killed in combat, and 7,627 were killed in noncombat capacities. The total casualties so far, and they are still increasing, amount to 318,293 as of 1 week ago.

This is a high price to pay for an area which is not vital to the security of this country and never was. This is a high price to pay for a war which was a mistake. This is a high price to pay for a war which is a continuing tragedy and affects all elements of our population. In my opinion, it has had a large role in the development of internal domestic difficulties in this country. It has taken well over $100 billion of money to wage this war to which there really is no end in sight at the present time, money which in large part could better have been used to face up to problems of the ghettos, to meet the needs of our people, and in that way to be put to constructive use rather than destructive use.

I want to commend the administration for what it is doing in this respect, for the firmness it is showing against advice I am sure has been advanced that we get behind this government in Cambodia. We do not know what kind of a government it is and only time will tell. In any event, I hope the administration will show a forbearance in line with congressional amendments that there be no use of U.S. ground combat troops in Laos or Cambodia.

I want to assure the administration, in my capacity as a Senator from Montana and as majority leader, that I will continue to do my very best to support the administration in carrying out the Nixon policy, which I approve 100 percent, of keeping a low profile in our relations with nations not only in Southeast Asia but throughout the world, and in keeping to the phased withdrawals of our troops from Vietnam; and hopefully, if the opportunity arises, Cambodia and Laos notwithstanding, that that phased withdrawal can be increased considerably.

The President has tried through the Geneva accords, through the International Control Commission, and through private channels, with all means available at his command to bring about a lifting of this shadow which overhangs all of our lives, to the end that we can withdraw, lock, stock, and barrel, from all Southeast Asia. It is my hope that his efforts will bear fruit and that there will come a reconvening of the Geneva Conference; and out of that an ironclad guarantee to which all Geneva nations would give assent, which would insure the neutrality of all Southeast Asia. In this way perhaps peace can be achieved.

If we do not keep our feet on the path toward this objective, then I can see only increased costs, increased casualties, and I think we have had enough of both.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this discussion at all, other than once more to say that the distinguished majority leader has shown his judgment and his patriotism move hand in hand, as he indicates his support for the efforts of the administration. He and I both did our very vest with previous administrations and with the problems that were presented in foreign policy, to give support. We jointly are now doing it again.

I would add only one very small comment which in no way changes anything the majority leader said, and that is I often notice headlines to the effect that we are in a new war in Laos. Mr. President, there is no new war in Laos. The commitment of Americans in Laos on the ground, and outside of the air interdictions, has varied in the last several years between only 1,000 and 1,040 personnel, about one-half of which are civilians. Since January 20, 1969, deaths in Laos on the ground have amounted to seven, one military and six civilian. This does not look like a new war.

I say this only to make the point that we must not have even that many casualties in Cambodia. We must have no casualties whatever in Cambodia if we can avoid it, and the way to avoid it is to have no commitment in Cambodia, as the majority leader outlined, and that is the effort through many nations to preserve the neutrality of that troubled state.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader for his remarks. I must reiterate that what we are both trying to do is to be constructive with an administration which did not start the war, but which was saddled, in effect, with a number of problems connected with it, and a war which seems awfully difficult to disengage from at this time.

I thank the distinguished minority leader.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to the previous order, the Chair now recognizes for a period not to exceed 45 minutes, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON).

MENINGITIS OUTBREAK AT FORT LEONARD WOOD, MO.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I would like to speak this morning on the meningitis outbreak at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., and submit to the Senate my report and my findings in connection therewith.

I ask unanimous consent that, at the conclusion of my remarks, the full text of my report be printed.

Mr. EAGLETON. I also ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that following the printing of the text, various appendices and related documents be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUMMARY: INVESTIGATION, FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

INVESTIGATION

Mr. EAGLETON. Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., one of the larger military installations in our Nation, has experienced in recent months an exceptionally severe outbreak of meningitis. It dates back as far as October of 1969, and is an ongoing, continuing and currently existing crisis.

The carrier rate, according to the most recent survey, has reached 68 percent in some basic training units and 80 percent in some advanced individual training units. There have been 51 active cases of type C meningococcal disease, as compared with 15 last year. Thus far, there have been four deaths of military personnel on the base, and one additional death causally connected with the base, a young girl, age 16, Kathy Osiier, of Kansas City, Mo., who died last week in a Kansas City hospital of meningococcal disease.

Meningitis is a well-known phenomenon in Army training centers, and the Army has established a number of procedures for dealing with it. In the context of the extraordinary number of cases at Fort Leonard Wood this year, however, my office has received a great many allegations of improper or imprudent training procedures and inadequate medical care.

I have, therefore, through the dedicated efforts of some very fine staff people, conducted an extensive investigation of the Fort Leonard Wood situation over the past 20 days. I add parenthetically at this point, which every Senator knows, that a Senator's capability to function, insofar as that which he can seek to do, is directly proportional to the quality of his staff work; and in this instance two of my staff members have been singularly industrious, and I would like to commend them and have their names appear in the RECORD for their loyal efforts over and beyond the call of duty: Mr. Stephen Vossmeyer and Mr. Edward Filippine. These two men, along with others, have devoted over 600 man-hours to accumulating a massive amount of information from personal interviews, telephone interviews, written information, official replies to specific inquiries, and 2 long, long days of personal investigation at Fort Leonard Wood itself. Recruits, trainees, parents, doctors, and Army personnel of all ranks have been contacted and interviewed, both on the base at Fort Leonard Wood and outside the confines of the base at Fort Leonard Wood.

The information obtained is synthesized into the following report.

I recognize that this endeavor, despite our efforts, must of necessity be limited in scope. Obviously some points will not be covered as fully as others. Some points may not be covered at all.

I hope, nevertheless, that the following findings and recommendations will be helpful to the Army in completing its own investigation and in combating future outbreaks, and to the interested and concerned public, whose right to know must not be denied.

I would now like to summarize some of the major factual findings and some of our major conclusions.

MAJOR FACTUAL FINDINGS

A. Training procedures:

First. The relationship between the general physical condition of recruits and the incidence of meningitis is not definitely established to a medico-scientific certainty. However, specific procedures established by the Surgeon General of the United States and the Army itself require that overly exhaustive training routines should be eliminated when meningitis breaks out.

Second. These procedures recommended by the Army to halt the spread of meningitis were often violated at Fort Leonard Wood until after the meningitis reached epidemic proportions.

In fact, our investigation reveals that the first day on which Army procedures for safeguarding the health of the trainees and recruits at Fort Leonard Wood were fully complied with was, interestingly enough, 2 days before three Missouri Congressmen visited the base at Fort Leonard Wood. The visitation had previously been announced, and the base had suddenly, instantly, but tragically belatedly, shaped up for this visitation of Representatives ICHORD, RANDALL, and HALL.

B. Medical care:

First. Medical care for meningitis which was administered to the recruits once they entered the base hospital was excellent within the limitations of the available facilities.

Second. Procedures in some companies discouraged recruits from reporting for medical care, and these procedures continued for a substantial period of time after the outbreak reached epidemic proportions.

Third. A vaccine which, though still classified as experimental, had proven its value through widespread inoculation of 20,000 trainees was unavailable at Fort Leonard Wood until February 11, and then became available only in limited quantities, on a 1-in-5 basis. By some magical means, the doctors selected one out of every five recruits to perhaps survive. The others were to do it on their own, as best they could.

I have reached the following major conclusions relating to training procedures:

First. Had the authorities at Fort Leonard Wood followed from the outset the procedures prescribed by the Surgeon General and by the Army, the meningitis outbreak may well not have reached such serious proportions.

Second. The overly exhausting training routine, the lack of adequate sleep, et cetera, caused many recruits to be in a state of serious fatigue.

I believe that the overly exhausting training routine and the lack of adequate sleep—all of which are specified in the Surgeon General's regulations as prohibited especially during a meningitis crisis—caused many recruits to be in a state of serious fatigue. We have testimony that one of the leading doctors at Fort Leonard Wood talked to the parents of one of the diseased recruits and confided that after examining many young men in the hospital they "were not really sick in an identifiable disease sense, but rather they are suffering from exhaustion."

Groups at this base, Mr. President, were exhausted and fatigued, and you do not have to be a doctor, you do not have to be an epidemiologist, to know that any individual in a state of fatigue or exhaustion is susceptible to the contraction of illness.

Therefore, in my judgment, had such a condition of fatigue been avoided by following the Surgeon General's and the Army's own procedures, rules, and regulations, the epidemic proportions of the meningitis could well have been less severe.

My conclusions on medical care are as follows:

Once recruits were diagnosed as having meningitis, they received excellent medical care. Most doctors at the base should be commended for their dedication and their industry in this matter. Many of them stayed up night after night with some of these boys. Fortunately, many of these patients survived. Unfortunately, four of them died.

I also conclude that recruits in some units were both directly and indirectly discouraged from going on "sick call." Such discouragement in my judgment is unwise under even normal circumstances and is fatally dangerous when an epidemic is in the making.

One of the officers at Fort Leonard Wood, after the meningitis epidemic at Fort Wood had been brought out in public, appeared on television in my home city of St. Louis and pointed out that "The good guys don't go on sick call. The good guys don't complain. The good guys take it like a man." And if he had completed his statement, he might have added that the good guys die in their bunks.

I should like at this point, to describe one of the most tragic cases, Mr. President.

This boy, Pvt. Larry Breeling, did not die of meningococcal meningitis; he died of pneumococcal pneumonia.

Larry Breeling was admitted to the hospital on Friday, February 13, with an upper respiratory infection. He was discharged from the hospital on Sunday, February 15, 2 days later. At that time, all symptoms were classified as normal.

On Tuesday, February 17, he was required to make up a physical proficiency test that he had missed—a rather rigorous test. He had completed 4 of the 5 parts of the test when he told his drill instructor that he was sick, and asked if he could be excused from taking the last part—the mile run. Although he already had compiled enough points to pass, the sergeant reportedly explained that failure to complete the entire test would require retaking it. Apparently this is one Army regulation that is stringently enforced.

He ran it—or, more properly, he walked it. He then "double timed it" back to the barracks.

At 5:30 p.m., he went to his barracks, throwing up, with severe headaches, and he became delirious, talking of "getting" the sergeant who made him run back to the barracks.

At 6:15, one of the other recruits in the barracks—they have, Mr. President, what is known as the buddy system where the recruits are supposed to help each other—had found a sergeant who came to Breeling's room.

The sergeant did so, and upon leaving the room he is reported to have commented that, "If he is not careful, he's going to talk himself into a court-martial."

Despite more vomiting, difficult breathing, and complaints of pain, no further action was taken. Despite numerous pleas by several roommates that he go to the hospital, and despite having many of the symptoms of meningitis when the sergeant came in, Breeling remained in the barracks without medication.

There he died, some time before 3:45 a.m. the next morning, of pneumococcal pneumonia which develops in several days and has a 30-percent mortality rate if untreated. A delirious 19-year-old in obvious distress with serious symptoms was not sent to the base hospital simply because he indicated that he did not want to go and no one in authority sent him.

That is the story of Larry Breeling, who was a good guy. Good guys do not go on sick call, Mr. President.

A final medical observation: The U.S. Army prides itself on supplying its men with the best of training, the best of weapons, presumably the best of everything. Why did the U.S. Army not take the necessary steps to supply its men with necessary vaccine, which had been successfully tested 19,999 out of 20,000 times, and which was then available but unpackaged in a drug manufacturer's factory? Why did it take until February 11 to start utilizing this vaccine on a 1-in-5 basis? The crisis had started in October, grew in November, expanded in December, continued unabated in January.

It seems to me that almost raises the same question which some doctors have raised with respect to heart transplants: Who is to decide who has the right to live, or the duty to die? Who is to decide, of all the trainees at Fort Leonard Wood, who is to get a chance to have the inoculation, and which four unlucky ones do not?

The Army's attitude throughout this investigation has been a curious one. There have been one or two rather informative letters from Secretary Resor, which give the appearance of cooperation, but never a complete answer. To this very minute, at 10 minutes to 11, certain requests for specific information that we have submitted over a month ago to Secretary Resor have not been answered. When it became known that I would speak on this subject at 10 o'clock this morning, I was informed that further information would be made available at 11, after my report was filed and after the presentation has been made.

What is it about the Army that makes them take such fiendish delight in playing hide-and-go-seek with public information? We know that some of the information was prepared at least 12 days ago at Fort Leonard Wood. We know it because somebody at Fort Leonard Wood allowed us to see it. We have seen an advance copy—an incorrect advanced copy, I might add, because there were factual errors in it. But it was there.

My office will get it some time today, or tomorrow, or next week, or next month, or next year.

I do not know why the U.S. Army believes that it has been anointed to exercise some kind of mandate to operate in secrecy.

We ask for the names and addresses of young recruits in various units over 3 weeks ago. What is so complicated about that? Most of the units that we were interested in interviewing have now graduated and scattered from Fort Leonard Wood.

That is as good a reason as I know of not to give us the list, because now we would have to run all over the country, wherever they have been transferred after their recruit training, to interview them. I guess that is a darn good reason for the Army not to give us the information.

So I resent—and I resent very bitterly—the fact that the Army has been less than totally candid in its divulgence of facts, statistics, and information that is easily ascertainable to them and, which would have been useful in our investigation.

I find another attitude of the Army in this matter serious.

Time and again, we are told meningitis outbreaks occur all the time. This year at Fort Leonard Wood; last year at Fort Lewis, Wash.; the year before at Fort Ord. Next year, fort what? Next year, what State, what base, what group of recruits is going to be hit with this because the Army does not even comply with its own procedures, or provide an adequate amount of vaccine. I do not know what fort, Mr. President. I do not know what training base. I do not know what group of recruits. But it will happen. It will happen again next year somewhere, unless the Army changes its attitude and changes its procedures and changes its benign acceptance of death at military installations.

So what will come of this, Mr. President? What will come of this 40-page report? What will come of the experience that has been gained by the people at Fort Leonard Wood in dealing with meningitis. I ask that as a rhetorical question, and I am uncertain of the answer.

Human nature is a funny thing. As an ex-prosecutor I have seen many instances where an aroused public could force immediate reforms. However, I also know that reforms often die out as fast as public interest does.

After the furor dies down, after the fine light of public opinion is redirected away from Fort Leonard Wood, after the questions I have raised have been ducked, and with the passage of time, will the Army revert to its old ways? Will the Army say, "Well, this crisis is over; EAGLETON has had his say; but now the heat is off and we will go back to business as usual"? If that be the Army attitude, I can predict that more young men will die next year when the weather turns again, because their procedures and their practices and their operations are such as to create an atmosphere inescapably conducive to the outbreak of meningococcal meningitis.

So I close, Mr. President, with the personal hope that perhaps the Army in this instance will say now is enough; that enough boys have died; that the procedures the Surgeon General spelled out were put on the books for a purpose; that they should be utilized; that inoculant vaccine should be where the crisis is and not in a factory; and that it is just as important to have medicine available on a base as it is to give Chiang Kai-shek bombers or jet fighters.

We can make such cumbersome overseas deliveries, and in the name of health and humanity, one would think we could take care of medical deliveries inside the United States.

I hope they have learned, and my hope is shared by others. I know that my hope is shared by Mr. Iglauer, who lost his only son. He is the one who originally contacted me over a month ago about this matter. He knows there is nothing I can do, or the Army can do, that will restore to life his dead son, but he does believe that his son's death should not be in vain or coldly forgotten. He hopes that if enough facts are known about his son's death and procedures at Fort Wood others in the future will not die.

I know that my hope is shared by the family and the brother of Larry Breeling, whose case I have described.

I talked from time to time to Larry Breeling's older brother, who is a law student in Iowa. He is not a vindictive young man. He is not out to have anyone court-martialed. He has the natural, innate curiosity that any relative has, to know how and why his brother died. But he also has the hope, like Mr. Iglauer, that his brother's death will, again, not be in vain.

Thus, I plead with the Army that these deaths not be in vain.

We cannot change the past. But the past is the prologue to the future and I hope that the future will be a far different one from the tragic experience of Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.

EXHIBIT I

REPORT ON MENINGITIS OUTBREAK AT FORT LEONARD WOOD, MO.

1. SUMMARY: INVESTIGATION, FINDINGS, AND CONCLUSIONS

Investigation

Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri, has experienced an exceptionally severe outbreak of meningitis this winter. The carrier rate, according to a recent survey, has reached 68% in some basic training units and 80% in some advanced individual training units. There have been 51 active cases of type C meningococcal disease, as compared with 15 last year. Thus far, there have been four deaths.

Meningitis is a well-known phenomenon in Army training centers, and the Army has established a number of procedures for dealing with it. In the context of the extraordinary number of cases at Fort Leonard this year, however, my office has received a great many allegations of improper or imprudent training procedures and inadequate medical care.

I have therefore conducted an extensive investigation of the Fort Leonard Wood situation over the past 28 days. Over 600 man-hours have been devoted to accumulating a massive amount of information from personal interviews, telephone interviews, written information, official replies to specific inquiries, and 2 days of personal investigation at Fort Leonard Wood itself. Recruits, trainees, parents, doctors, and Army personnel of all ranks have been contacted.

The information obtained is snythesized into the following report.

I recognize that this endeavor, despite our efforts, must of necessity be limited in scope. Obviously some points will not be covered as fully as others. Some points may not be covered at all.

I hope, nevertheless, that the following findings and recommendations will be helpful to the Army in completing its own investigation and in combatting future outbreaks, and to the interested and concerned public, whose right to know must not be denied.

Major factual findings

(a) Training procedures:

1. The relationship between the general physical condition of recruits and the incidence of meningitis is not definitely established to a medico-scientific certainty. However, specific procedures established by the Surgeon General and the Army require that overly exhaustive training routines should be eliminated when meningitis breaks out.

2. These procedures recommended by the Army to halt the spread of meningitis were often violated at Fort Leonard Wood until well after the meningitis reached epidemic proportions.

(b) Medical care:

1. Medical care for meningitis received by recruits once they entered the base hospital was excellent within the limitations of the available facilities.

2. Procedures in some companies discouraged recruits from reporting for medical care, and these procedures continued for a substantial period of time after the outbreak reached epidemic proportions.

3. A vaccine which, though still classified as experimental, had proven its value through widespread inoculation of 20,000 trainees was unavailable at Fort Leonard Wood until February, and then only in limited quantities.

Major conclusions

(a) Training procedures:

1. Had the authorities at Fort Leonard Wood followed from the outset the procedures prescribed by the Surgeon General and the Army, the meningitis outbreak may well not have reached such serious proportions.

2. The overly exhausting training routine, the lack of adequate sleep, etc., caused many recruits to be in a state of serious fatigue. Individuals in such a state are susceptible to contraction of illness. Had such a condition of fatigue been avoided by following the Surgeon General's and Army's own regulations, the epidemic proportions of the meningitis could well have been less severe.

(b) Medical care:

1. Once recruits were diagnosed as having meningitis, they received excellent medical care. However, established preventive medical techniques were not widely utilized.

2. Recruits in some units were directly and indirectly discouraged from going on "sick call." Such discouragement is unwise under even normal circumstances and is fatally dangerous when an epidemic is in the making.

3. The United States Army, which prides itself on supplying its men with the best of training, the best of weapons, the best of everything, should have taken steps to supply its men with necessary vaccine which was then available in a drug manufacturer's factory.

II. NATURE OF THE EPIDEMIC

Normally, the number of meningitis cases reported each year at Fort Leonard Wood is relatively low. During the six-year period of 1964–1969, cases of meningitis at Fort Leonard Wood totaled 181, with three deaths reported.

However, since October 1, 1969, Fort Wood has suffered the worst outbreak of meningococcal disease at any base in the nation. Fifty-one men have been stricken. Four have died.

Table A shows the number of Type C Meningococcal Disease cases and the month diagnosed since 1964.

All deaths, and all but seven of the cases reported since October 1 of this year, have occurred in basic training units.

As of March 17, 1970, 27 cases and all 4 deaths had occurred in the 2nd Basic Combat Training (BCT) Brigade, while the 3rd BCT Brigade had experienced 15 cases and no fatalities.

Table B summarizes information on epidemiological trend groupings for meningococcal disease cases at Fort Leonard Wood for the period from October 21, 1969 to March 12, 1970.

In addition to meningococcal disease, admissions to the hospital for upper respiratory infection this year are nearly triple those of the same period last year according to the Army. Approximately 900 cases of upper respiratory infection were admitted during February 1969. In February this year, nearly 2,500 admissions for upper respiratory infection were recorded. Most of these were among basic trainees. One died of pneumonia.

On February 23, in response to these reports of exhaustive duty, extensive harassment and inadequate medical assistance at the base, I asked Secretary Resor to make an investigation into the situation at Fort Leonard Wood. I renewed that request on February 27 and March 2. I urged it again in a speech on the Senate floor on March 3. The speech and the letters to Secretary Resor can be found in Appendix I.

On March 6, 1970, Secretary Resor partially answered my initial request. He discussed the nature of meningitis and the procedures used to combat it at Fort Leonard Wood. He stated in part (emphasis added):

"I fully share your concern for the health and welfare of our soldiers at Fort Leonard Wood as expressed in your recent letters. I am closely following the meningitis outbreak at Fort Leonard Wood. The Surgeon General and the Command Surgeons of Fifth Army and CONARC have been in close contact with post authorities and their representatives have visited Fort Leonard Wood this week to insure that all appropriate measures are being taken and to provide necessary assistance.

"The meningococcus, causative agent of meningococcal meningitis, is transmitted as a respiratory disease. Most individuals who contract infection with this organism do not become ill, but "carry" it at no harm to themselves. During the peak of the respiratory disease season, about 20 percent of newly-arrived recruits will be found to carry the meningococcus. Bringing these young men, from varied backgrounds, and with varied past disease experience, together into the military setting with close contact and increased physical activity fosters the transmission of the meningococcus as well as other respiratory agents.

"Until vaccines become generally available against this disease, only non-specific preventive measures are applicable. These include measures to prevent or to slow the transmission of respiratory agents and to improve individual resistance. Examples of such measures which are undertaken at all basic training posts, including Fort Leonard Wood, are: training in personal hygiene, prevention of mixing of personnel from various units, provision of adequate barracks' space, control of post population density, and provision of adequate nutrition, rest and ventilation.

"Some of the actions that the Army has taken at Fort Leonard Wood as part of the 'preventive medicine' program are: early morning runs in BCT have been eliminated; men are excused from morning training the day following guard duty or K.P.; guard duty has been shifted from the third and fourth week of BCT to the eighth week, when the schedule is less strenuous; company officers inspect barracks at "lights out" and thirty minutes before reveille to insure that all trainees are in bed; and duty personnel check the barracks throughout the night to insure that the ventilation is adequate."

Also on March 6, Congressman Ichord, Randall, and Hall began and completed an investigation of the situation at Fort Leonard Wood for the House Armed Services Committee. Congressman Ichord found the situation was "under control." He further stated that it would take five or six days to separate fact from fiction and would require a "different method of approach." However, he did not feel such an additional investigation was necessary. The transcript of the Ichord, Hall, and Randall press conference is found in Appendix 2.

Not satisfied that fact could not be separated from fiction, I announced on March 7 that "my office will continue to conduct its own examination of the Fort Leonard Wood matter . . . The focus of my examination will be on these basic questions:

"1. Were overly exhausting training practices at Fort Leonard Wood contributory to the spinal meningitis?

"2. Once meningitis cases began to develop, did the base promptly take the necessary precautions, including changes in training schedule, to control the spread of meningitis?

"3. Were procedures for necessary medical assistance readily available without any harassment and without any penalty to the trainee if he sought such medical assistance?

"4. Was the medical assistance itself adequate?"

Allegations which prompt these questions and my findings are set out in the following sections.

III. ALLEGATIONS

In recent weeks our office has received many allegations by letter, telegram and telephone regarding training and hospital procedures at Fort Leonard Wood.

In order to separate fact from fiction it was decided to interview those who had contacted our office. Information obtained from these people led to other contacts and further interviews. As much information as possible was sought in an effort to be comprehensive and unbiased.

Obviously, complaints are not conclusive in themselves. Some were unwarranted, others reflected isolated incidents and experiences, but many reflected unacceptable conditions.

Fatigue, lack of sleep time, extra duty details, overexertion, general training procedures, medical treatment and its accessibility through sick call, are the most common complaints, but not the only ones.

The subject matter of these complaints is overlapping. For example, lack of sleep is often related to the lack of compensatory time off for necessary night details as well as early morning running. Obviously these are all related to fatigue, as are other training procedures.

The following analysis covers the broad range of complaints in an attempt to indicate the starting point for our inquiry.

Sleep

Private Henry Iglauer, (Co. C, 5th Bn, 2nd BCT Bde), who died of meningitis, stated in several letters that he was getting only six hours sleep. On one occasion he complained of being up until 2 A.M. preparing for inspection, only to be roused at 4 A.M. to start the day with only two hours sleep time. Just two days before his death he referred to a "persistent lack of sleep."

On February 6, Private David Mack, (Co. B, 4th Bn, 2nd BCT Bde), also one of the meningitis fatalities, wrote that he had only one and one half hours of sleep after GI'ing his barracks, then pulling fire guard at 3 A.M., then getting up when his company got up at 4 A.M. He was hospitalized five days later.

Private Stephen Lagermann, (Co. C, 5th Bn, 2nd BCT Bde), a third fatality, told of getting up at 3:30 A.M. On February 11, 1970, he stated: "We have been getting at the most four hours of sleep at night." In fairness, in a letter dated February 15, 1970 he noted a change, stating that C–5–2 was allowed to sleep until 5:00 A.M., as required by regulations.

These complaints about lack of sleep are not isolated; they are widespread. Other trainees making such complaints asked that their names be withheld for fear of retaliation.

Although "lights out" was at 9:00 P.M., many trainees indicated that it was impossible to go to bed then and still do all that was required to prepare for the next day. Others chose to do personal letter writing after 9:00 P.M.

Some of the companies and platoons were required to get up between 4:00 and 4:30 A.M. Others were allowed to sleep until 5:00 A.M. Some companies received the required 8 hours rest regularly. Others clearly did not.

Reasons for this varied. Often work or night duties cut into rest time. Certainly running before breakfast did. Some trainees chose to get up early to prepare their barracks. Others were roused by zealous platoon guides for the same reason.

Interviews indicated that the Third Brigade usually received 8 hours sleep even before Col. Reberry assumed command on January 22, 1970.

Being tired after less than eight hours sleep was a general complaint in the 2nd Brigade until several policies were changed.

Running

Col. Greer, the 2nd Brigade Commanding Officer, stated that he encouraged pre-breakfast running.

Private Iglauer related that C–5–2 ran between two and four miles. If the company didn't sound off loudly they went from double-time to full sprints and were required to run an extra distance. Pvt. Lagermann, also of C–5–2, indicated that runs of two and one half miles before breakfast were increased within a few days to four miles.

Obviously running before breakfast required getting up before 5:00 A.M., unless the breakfast hour were to be changed. Such runs had an effect on both sleep and fatigue.

Some companies in the 2nd Brigade did not run, but C–5–2 was by no means the only company in the 2nd Brigade to engage in pre-breakfast runs.

All running was discontinued in mid-February.

Training procedures

General training procedures were also criticized.

In the Second Brigade, Pvt. Lagermann complained of being hot and sweaty after a three mile run and then taking an hour of outside physical training and of forced marches from the rifle range followed by an hour of physical training. Overheating from not being able to remove or unzip jackets in the mess hall was also mentioned.

Members of the 3rd Brigade told of marching as many as 8 or 9 miles to a bivouac area and then being given Physical Combat Proficiency Tests.

Base procedure for infiltration course training was also criticized. Department of Army regulations require that the course be run once in daylight without live fire and again after dark with live ammunition. The course was usually extremely wet and men were required to wait hours while wet and muddy for the second run.

Sick call policies

Certain sick call policies and practices in a number of companies in the 2nd Brigade were criticized, especially requirements that the sick man pack all his gear and haul it to supply before going to sick call. In fact for about 10 days in February, with URI and meningitis outbreaks at their peak, one company, E–4–2, instituted the cleaning of rifles as an additional pre-requisite before going on sick call.

One report indicates that one 2nd Brigade trainee was forced to crawl the length of the barracks and back before being allowed to go on sick call, but this is judged to be an isolated instance of harassment.

A 3rd Brigade trainee was forced to do push-ups before going. This, too, appears not to be a common practice.

Others indicated that the attitude and tone of some Drill Instructors and sergeants was intimidating, especially to the younger men.

Quality of medical care and treatment in hospital

The quality of medical treatment has also been criticized. Pvt. Lagermann wrote that unless one had a 104° temperature or better, one got two aspirins from the hospital and was sent back into the field.

This appears to be a misunderstanding. The evidence strongly indicates that anyone with a temperature of 101° or more was and is automatically admitted to the hospital and those with less are admitted upon the judgment of the doctors.

Patients complained about orderly duty in the hospital, especially in the old hospital. Patients were assigned to clean floors, latrines and shower stalls. Others complained of being forced to lie on the covers of their hospital beds all day after making them. Conditions in the old hospital were often criticized.

Other complaints

Other complaints regarding the length of sick call lines seem to be understandable since in January and February there were many upper respiratory infection (URI) cases in addition to other diseases and ailments.

Some men complained of poor sanitary conditions, for instance doing the low crawl or other training exercises that require becoming wet and muddy and then not being allowed to wash up for mess.

The lack of sneeze sheets was also mentioned. However, they are now up.

Isolated complaints about temperatures of 46°, 52° and 58° in the barracks were heard, especially in January.

IV. FINDINGS

Were overly exhaustive training practices contributory to the outbreak of spinal meningitis?

No one can definitely say with medico-scientific certitude. There is no medical evidence to prove whether over-exertion, exhaustion, physical fatigue, prolonged exposure to inclement weather, inadequate sleep, and a myriad of other strenuous practices are in themselves contributory to spinal meningitis.

However, measures which are effective against the spread of disease which is transmitted via the respiratory route, as spinal meningitis is, have been recommended by the Surgeon General, the Continental Army Command (CONARC), the 5th Army, and the medical personnel at Fort Leonard Wood. These recommendations do deal with overly exhaustive training procedures.

The Department of the Army Technical Bulletin, TB MED 274, on meningococcal disease prescribes that "an integral portion of environmental control is related to protecting the resistance of the individual by eliminating unnecessary fatigue, maintaining nutrition, and reducing environmental exposure to chilling and overheating." It further recommends that "a minimum of 8 hours of rest or sleep including compensatory time for night exercises or duty should be observed," and the "fitting of physical training and exertion to the capabilities of the individual to prevent unnecessary fatigue."

These rules were not rigorously followed at Fort Leonard Wood until recently. Less than 8 hours of sleep was common. Compensatory time off for night duty did not become policy in the 2nd Brigade until after the beginning of March. Extra physical training was not curtailed until half way through February. And concern over environmental exposure did not extend to one of the most rigorous exercises, the running of the infiltration course, until early March.

No one can say that if these rules were followed and enforced that the incidences of upper respiratory infection and meningitis would have been prevented or even substantially curtailed. But the fact remains that they were not followed, and this is discussed in more detail under the following heading.

Once meningitis cases began to develop, did the base promptly take the necessary precautions, including changes in training schedule, to control the spread of meningitis?

The Army prescribes procedures for dealing with the outbreak of meningitis. According to the Surgeon General's Office, these should be in effect throughout the upper respiratory infection and meningitis season.

The Department of the Army Technical Bulletin, TB MED 274, on Meningococcal disease prescribes the following measures:

"b. Environmental measures. These measures are effective against spread of disease transmitted via the respiratory route. The purpose of environmental control is to reduce to the minimum the droplet spread of infection by decreasing group intermingling and density of the individuals making up the group. An integral portion of environmental control is related to protecting the resistance of the individual by eliminating unnecessary fatigue, maintaining nutrition, and reducing environmental exposure to chilling and overheating.

"c. Control Plan. The following points contain elements of those measures which can be incorporated into preventive medicine plans for command execution:

"(1) Plans should be flexible, provide minimum interference with the military mission and maximum safeguards to the health of the command.

"(a) Phased control measures to progressively provide increased protection by restricting group and individual mixing as the potential incidence of disease increases are recommended.

"(b) Thorough dissemination of the plan and orientation of unit leaders and individual personnel on the basic philosophy behind the plan is absolutely necessary to insure success. The basic trainee, for example, will forego many recreational and off duty activities if he understands that restrictions are in effect to protect his health in order that he may complete his training in the shortest time with his basic training unit.

"(2) Specific control measures applicable to Military Training Centers:

"(a) The company or platoon system should be strictly applied. This system forms incoming personnel into self-contained units which vary in size according to the requirements of troop housing. Platoon sized units are preferable. The integrity of the unit must be maintained to the maximum extent possible at all times. Where possible, the unit should be formed at the reception station and be kept intact during the entire training period so that during all processing, training, housing, messing, and recreational activities minimum contact occurs between units. The ideal situation would be to isolate units and thus limit exposures to respiratory disease agents to those already present in the unit.

"(b) Basic trainees will be provided 72 square feet of sleeping space per bed. All other personnel require not less than 55 square feet of sleeping space per bed. Provision of less space in personnel housing carries the danger of increasing respiratory disease spread. Commanders who are forced to accommodate personnel in housing with less than 55 square feet of sleeping space must be willing to accept increased incidence of all respiratory disease including meningococcal infections.

"(c) Plans to control population density in facilities which require use by more than one unit must be formulated and enforced. This includes placing limits on numbers of personnel from the same unit in a given area, at any one time. Common use facilities include latrines, messes, dispensaries, post exchanges, snack bars; rooms in service clubs, classrooms, theaters, chapels, and bowling alleys. Mobile P-'s, 16 mm. commercial movies (paid attendance), unit area chapel services, scheduled sick calls, and other measures may be necessary to reduce unit contact during periods of high disease incidence.

"(d) Prevention of back-to-back training cycles to permit maintenance and airing of individual barracks is encouraged.

"(3) Other measures:

"(a) A minimum of 8 hours of rest or sleep including compensatory time for night exercises or duty should be observed.

"(b) Fitting physical training and exertion to the capabilities of the individual to prevent unnecessary fatigue. Extra periods of physical exercise for individuals or groups as a disciplinary measure are not recommended.

"(c) Supervision of the proper use of clothing and equipment to avoid overheating and, particularly, chilling is very important.

"(d) Encouraging and supervising personal hygiene is necessary. Covering the mouth and nose when coughing and sneezing reduces infective droplets in the air. Spitting should be avoided. Mouth and teeth cleansing reduce bacterial flora in the oropharynx.

"(e) Adequate ventilation, tempered by the ambient temperature and wind conditions, dilute infective organisms in the atmosphere of closed areas. Baffle boards on window reduce discomfort from drafts and encourage adequate ventilation. Opening bottom and top windows 2 inches in most barracks provides approximately 600 cubic foot per minute air exchange and is sufficient for control purposes.

"(f) The extension of the "buddy system," which is used to prevent heat and cold injuries and detect attached ticks in some training areas, can be extended to assist in early recognition of meningococcal infections. Buddies are responsible for getting each other to report to sick call at the earliest symptom of severe respiratory infection. This aids in preventing the highly motivated trainee from endangering his life by not reporting respiratory disease and meningococcal infection for the early diagnosis and treatment which is so essential.

"(g) Other measures which have been effective in reducing respiratory and droplet-spread diseases are wet mopping, airing of bedding, "sneeze sheets" between beds, head-to-foot arrangement of beds, complete airing of barracks during periods of non-occupancy, maintaining barracks temperature between 68° and 72° F. during occupancy and maintaining relative humidity between 50 and 60 percent."

Medical and command personnel stressed that all cadre should learn to observe trainees for symptoms of any illness. In October, two-hour classes on meningitis and upper respiratory infections were held. A one-hour examination was given on these classes. Also, new Drill Instructors and personnel were reportedly informed.

The Commander of the 4th Battalion indicated that permanent party personnel were instructed in URI and meningitis symptoms at least three times.

The "buddy system," under which trainees observe one another and report any signs of illness to an officer or non-commissioned officer was stressed.

The Breeling Case: A Break Down in the Prevention system. On many occasions the "budding system" worked well, and officers exercised good judgment. However, this system is only as good as the cadre and on occasion it tragically broke down. One such breakdown came when Pvt. Larry Breeling, a member of Company E, 4th Battalion, 2nd BCT Brigade, died in his barracks of pneumococcal pneumonia.

Private Breeling was admitted to the hospital on Friday, February 13, 1970 with 101.2° temperature and diagnosed as having an upper respiratory infection. There he received salt water gargle, aspirins, cough syrup and forced fluids. When discharged on Sunday, 15 February 1970, his urine analysis, blood count, throat culture and temperature were normal and his chest was clear, so he was not given a "medical profile" restricting him to light duty.

A make-up Physical Combat Proficiency Test was given on Tuesday afternoon, February 17 for everyone who missed the original on Saturday. Since Pvt. Breeling did not have a light duty profile and did not ask to be excused from the test, he began to take it.

After completing four of the five training exercises, he complained to the sergeant that he was not feeling well, and asked to be excused from the fifth part of the test, the mile run. Although he already had enough points to pass, the sergeant reportedly explained that failure to complete the entire test would require retaking it in its entirety.

Private Breeling then "ran" the mile in 20 minutes and upon completion double-timed back to his barracks, a distance of several blocks.

The Battalion commander said the supervising sergeant did not order Breeling to run back to his barracks although Breeling told a roommate that he had.

Breeling got to his room about 5:30 P.M. complaining of pains in his legs. Several roommates tried to help by rubbing his legs. He began to complain of a headache and his roommates indicated that he was hot, feverish and breathing hard. He later vomited several times.

At this point the "buddy system" worked: one of his roommates went to find the Charge of Quarters. Although unable to find the CQ he did find another sergeant who came to Breeling's room about 6:15 PM.

Breeling was described as being incoherent and talking about getting even with the sergeant who made him run back from the PT test—an unusual thing to do in front of another sergeant. Upon leaving the room without taking any action the sergeant is reported to have said something to the effect: "If he's not careful, he's going to talk himself into a court-martial."

Despite more vomiting, difficult breathing and complaints of pain, no further action was taken. Despite numerous pleas by several roommates that he go to the hospital, and despite having many of the symptoms of meningitis when the sergeant came in, Breeling remained in the barracks without medication.

There he died, sometime before 3:45 AM the next morning, of pneumococcal pneumonia which develops in several days and has a 30% mortality rate if untreated. A delirious 19 year old in obvious distress with serious symptoms was not sent to the base hospital simply because he indicated that he did not want to go and no one in authority sent him.

A copy of the military police report of this case, dated 20 February, 1970 is attached hereto as Appendix 3.

Human judgments were involved in the Breeling case and they were tragically wrong. It is understandable that courses, lesson plans and memorandum cannot prevent a tragic mistake in human judgment.

But certain aspects of lesson plans, memorandum, recommendations and regulations are simple to interpret and easy to follow, and they were not implemented early or uniformly at Fort Leonard Wood despite the meningitis outbreak.

Environmental controls

Sleeping Space

Control Plan C, (2)(b) provides for 72 square feet of sleeping space for trainees. Stress is placed on the maintaining of adequate ventilation and heating.

Apparently this standard is being met at Fort Leonard Wood. Two types of two-man rooms are found in the basic training barracks, one with 174 square feet, the other with 199 square feet. One-man rooms contain 117 sq. feet and the NCO lounge, sometimes used when barracks are full contains 243 sq. feet for three people. All these rooms meet the standard.

Most of the rooms in the new barracks where trainees are roomed were originally designed for 8 people. However, one of the beds has been removed in order to meet the 72 sq. foot standard. Since at least last August, only 7 trainees have occupied these 517 sq. foot rooms, an average of approximately 74 sq. feet per trainee. However, 8 large wall lockers take up considerable space which may bring the average below 72 sq. feet. Also, the distribution of men on each side of a half-wall divide, three men on one side and 4 on the other, causes further doubts about the actual space available per man.

If this standard is critical to health, then these factors should be checked further.

Quonset huts contain 2,096.1 square feet and are occupied by a maximum of 28 men. This appears to be adequate.

Temperature control between 68 and 72 degrees is recommended for the barracks. Water cans are used to maintain the recommended humidity between 50 and 60 percent. Humidity control presents a real problem.

When checked on March 18 the barracks temperature was approximately 68 degrees. However, some 3rd Brigade trainees indicated that during January, barracks thermostats dropped as low as 46, 52, and 58.

Recommendations include the use of baffle boards to improve ventilation while reducing the discomfort from draft. However, baffle boards are apparently not used.

Further, trainees indicated that windows were not weather-stripped, causing an influx of cold air around the windows.

SNEEZE SHEETS

Sec. C(2)(g) recommends that "sneeze sheets" be used to minimize the spread of respiratory diseases by droplet. Apparently they are presently used in all companies of both brigades. The 3rd Brigade has had them up, as Brigade policy, since last October. They were incorporated as 2nd Brigade policy sometime between mid-February and early March.

However, in fairness to the 2nd Brigade, there was a minor medical controversy at Ft. Leonard Wood over whether "sneeze sheets" did more good by minimizing droplet spread, or harm by interfering with ventilation.

This controversy was settled in February, as URI and meningitis increased, and a recheck of TB Med 274, Department of Army Technical Bulletin, on meningococcal disease indicated that "sneeze sheets" should be used. On February 12, a letter was sent to all commands, down to the company level, requiring "sneeze sheets" between beds. However, interviews indicated that "sneeze sheets" were not up in many companies of the 2nd Brigade until early March.

Individual protective measures

Adequate Sleep

Directives require a minimum of 8 hours of rest or sleep throughout the URI season, including compensatory time for night exercises or duty. Apparently these directives were followed with few exceptions in the 3rd Brigade. In the 2nd Brigade, however, they were not followed rigorously until recently.

The directives were clear: On October 6, 1969, on page two, Paragraph g(3), "adequate rest providing 8 hours of sleep per day per trainee;" on December 20, 1969, p. 2, Paragraph d, "Sleep. (1) assure receptees and trainees an opportunity for a minimum of 8 hours sleep nightly;" on February 12, 1970, Subject: Prevention and Control of Respiratory Infection, Par. E, Individual Protective Measures: "(1) avoid unnecessary fatigue. Provide 8 hours of sleep, including compensatory time for night exercises or duty;" in Sec. (3)(a) of the Department of the Army Technical Bulletin, TB MED 274, on meningococcal disease, it states "A minimum of 8 hours of rest or sleep including compensatory time for night exercises or duty should be observed." (See Appendix 4)

Nothing could be clearer. However notwithstanding all these directives, 8 hours sleep time including compensatory time for night duties, was not enforced uniformly in the Second Brigade. Companies were roused before 5:00 until February 13. Compensatory time was not Brigade policy until March 2.

Although lights out was at 9:00 PM, many trainees found it impossible to retire and still be adequately prepared for the next day. Others, anxious to write home, could only find time after 9:00 PM.

Extensive interviews indicate that many trainees in 2nd Brigade companies arose anywhere between 4:00 and 4:30 AM until mid-February. A few indicated on some occasions they got up before 4:00.

In his letter of February 15, 1970, Private Lagermann mentioned the mid-February change and noted trainees were allowed to sleep until 5:00 a.m.

This change which partially complies with provisions for 8 hours sleep came only after 26 meningitis cases were diagnosed and even then it was only in partial fulfillment of the recommendations.

In the 2nd Brigade prior to March 2, no compensatory time for sleep was given for night exercises or duty. Fireguard duty in the permanent buildings was required about once every five days, and in the quonset huts once every three days. KP and guard duty also took sleep time.

On March 2, compensatory time was given for all three activities, finally bringing procedures into compliance with directives. In addition, the 2nd Brigade procedure for fireguard was changed. Previously 8 men would take one hour shifts. Now two men work the entire night, two hours on and two hours off with compensatory sleep time given until noon the next morning.

Colonel Greer expressed concern that compensatory time would hinder the training mission since trainees on fireguard duty now miss training until noon the following day. However, upon questioning he admitted that procedures were available for making up any missed instruction by taking training with another company and, if necessary, another Brigade. It appears that granting compensatory time creates more of an administrative nuisance than a hazard to full and complete training.

The 3rd Brigade still runs guard duty on one hour shifts, but gives compensatory sleep time to insure eight hours sleep.

Guard duty also has been changed in both Brigades. It is now scheduled only in the 7th and 8th weeks when the schedule is less strenuous.

Early Morning Running

Brigade policies on early morning running also differed. In the 3rd Brigade the policy was that there would be no morning runs in the winter months. Colonel Greer, the 2nd Brigade CO, encouraged running.

Colonel Greer expressed concern that physical training (PT) was not adequate. He stated that many trainees told him upon the completion of their training that PT was not rough enough. He therefore said that he encouraged running, which actually is double time, and the Air Borne shuffle, as an addition to physical conditioning. The breakfast schedule interfered with the time available for some companies to run. He further pointed out that the men ran without heavy jackets to avoid becoming overheated. The running was stopped around February 13 after a phone call from Colonel Miller, the head of the base hospital, who expressed his concern over the apparent fatigue in many of the men reporting to the hospital.

Colonel Greer indicated he would like his Brigade to run again after the URI season.

The distance is not known, but where it did occur, sleep time was affected. Colonel Petersen, CO of the 5th Battalion indicated the maximum run was about 2.2 miles at a cadence of 180 steps per minute. This took at least a half hour.

Private Steven Lagermann of the 5th Battalion wrote that they ran about two and one-half miles before breakfast and within a few days were running about four miles.

The commander of the 4th Battalion indicated that it was based on an exercise period of 15 minutes.

Chills

Directives indicate that overheating and chilling should be avoided. Some trainees complained that they become overheated because they were required to stand in the mess line with their jackets on and zipped. However, this was not Brigade policy and around mid-February was specifically prohibited.

Other trainees complained of sustained periods of vigorous outside exercise followed by sustained periods of outside instruction causing chills. For instance, Private Lagermann complained on February 11 that a march of six and one-half miles was followed by an hour of physical training outside without coats.

This and other similar allegations were neither proved or disproved but some improvements in basic training conditions were evident.

The infiltration course serves as an excellent example. On March 18, during a visit to the infiltration course heavy equipment was present, moving dirt and gravel in an attempt to dry it off.

The sergeant in charge indicated that the course had been reconstructed last October and this was the first attempt to dry it out. Originally it was constructed so the high point was in the middle allowing the course to drain. However, after thousands of men ran, or more precisely, crawled the course, ruts would retain water and the course usually remained extremely wet. In an attempt to correct this, the heavy equipment was brought out for the first time on March 18.

Procedure for training at the course was also changed. Prior to early March, trainees came to the infiltration course in the late afternoon, drew their helmets, and were instructed in how to run the course. After one runthrough in the daylight without live fire they were usually wet and muddy. They ate on the site in that condition and then were instructed on safety measures. Then they waited for dark to run it a second time with live ammunition. This procedure required wet and muddy trainees to eat, be instructed, and wait to run it again in the cold.

This procedure was change during the first week of March. Now after arriving at the course, trainees draw helmets, are instructed in both running the course and safety procedures, etc., and then when it is almost dark they run it for the first time. It is almost dark when they complete the first run, and they then turn around and run it a second time. The reconstruction of the course will lessen the trainees' chance of getting extremely wet and the change in procedure minimize the wet time spent outside.

Simple common-sense changes like this were long overdue. Without jeopardizing the maximum amount of training exposure to conditions that can lead to disease has been minimized.

Change such as this is commendable. But it came late. And, in fact, that is the story of our findings at Fort Wood. The 2nd Brigade, especially, waited until forced to institute uniformly the procedures that should have been instituted immediately. This policy of gradual tightening up is not acceptable. It is not up to a Brigade commander to second guess medical authorities or attempt to read medical statistics and decide medical policy.

In summary, after much delay, training conditions at Fort Wood today appear to be adequate. However, only strict and continued enforcement and vigilance can keep them that way.

Were procedures for necessary medical assistance readily available without harassment and without penalty to the trainee if he sought such medical assistance?

According to members of the command and medical staffs at Fort Leonard Wood, sick call is encouraged.

However, during the URI and meningitis season at Fort Leonard Wood, a policy of requiring the trainee to pack and transport all his gear to the supply room before reporting on sick call retarded this laudable objective.

Although the Commanding Officer of the 2nd Brigade, Colonel Greer, does not favor such a policy during basic training, it was nonetheless used in the 2nd Brigade, apparently at the discretion of company commanders.

It is my belief that this policy has no place in the fight against URI and meningitis. It is distressing that this policy runs counter to the wishes of the Brigade Commander, and that it apparently was instituted and followed without his knowledge. In some instances it was even pursued without the Battalion Commander's knowledge. (See Appendix 5)

For instance, Col. Greer, by letter dated March 10, 1970, to the Commanding General at Fort Leonard Wood, reiterated that this policy was not the policy of the 2nd Brigade and that only one company, C–5–2, was found to be using it—it was stopped."

However, after extensive investigation, it was learned that in the 2nd Brigade at least 6 of the 10 companies in the 4th and 5th Battalions had used this policy. Limitation of time and manpower precluded more extensive investigation into the policies of the 1st, 2nd or 3rd Battalion of the 2nd Brigade.

At a briefing on March 18, 1970, Col. Greer stated that he had determined a second company in the 5th Battalion also had used this policy.

Later that morning at a meeting in the 2nd Brigade Headquarters with the commanding officers of the 4th and 5th Battalions it was learned that 4 of the 5 companies in the 5th Battalion had used this policy. It was further learned that A–5–2 had discontinued it on January 21, after 3 meningitis cases in A Company; B–5–2 ended it on the 2nd of March; C–5–2 ended it on February 1 after two cases of meningitis; and Company D–5–2 reportedly ended it on February 10 after 2 cases of meningitis, although some evidence indicated it was not discontinued until several weeks later.

Further, at the same meeting the commander of the 4th Battalion denied that this practice had ever existed there. However, evidence has been accumulated that this policy had indeed been practiced in at least two companies of the 4th Battalion, B and E, and that in E–4–2 it had been instituted during the height of the URI and meningitis outbreak.

After inquiring during the day, Col. Greer conceded that this practice had been used in E Company of the 4th Battalion from approximately 16 February through 19 February. It was, we were told, instituted in preparation for a Command Maintenance and Management Inspection (CMMI). Further assurance had been offered Col. Greer by the Company Commander that the reason for the procedure was clearly explained to the men and that although gear was to be packed it was only to be taken to the day room in the barracks and not to the supply room several blocks away.

This simply was not substantiated by information previously obtained.

Col. Greer suggested that the matter be cleared up by interviewing a randomly selected samply of 16 members of E–4–2. This interview took place on the evening of March 18. It was determined from this interview, (and Colonel Greer and later the Commanding Officers of the 4th Battalion and E Company were present) that the practices had been instituted on February 9 and were continued for about 10 days. None of the trainees had heard of the CMMI inspection, and they were under the impression the gear was to be carried to the supply room. In addition they were required to clean their rifles.

One of the trainees volunteered the quite obvious fact that this procedure had discouraged other trainees from going on sick call. Equally distressing however, is that this procedure was in fact instituted in some companies during the URI and meningitis outbreak, and according to some sources, with a specific admonition to trainees that sick call was too high.

This procedure is sometimes rationalized as necessary to fulfill Paragraph 6–3, AR 700–84, which requires that "clothing and equipment of hospitalized personnel be immediately secured in the unit supply room." However, the 3rd Brigade apparently complies with all inventory requirements without using this procedure as do many 2nd Brigade Companies.

Clearly, communications had broken down. The Brigade Commander was unaware that this policy was being practiced, and Battalion Commanders were only partially aware of it. Had it been known, it apparently would have been stopped. No one in the command structure bothered to check closely. Even a company commander who ordered it did not check to see that the policy and the reason for its implementation was fully explained.

If it was implemented for the reasons and the manner stated by the company commander, it should have been so explained to the trainees. If it was intended to cut down on sick call, it is to be deplored. In fact, regardless of the reason for implementation, this policy is unacceptable.

Although isolated cases of individual harassment for going on sick call were reported (See Allegations above) in the 2nd and 3rd Brigades, they apparently are exceptions rather than the rule.

Information indicated that younger trainees were sometimes intimidated by the attitude and tone of certain Drill Instructors and Sergeants. On occasions they were reminded that certain mandatory training exercises were coming up and that recycling was mandatory if they didn't keep up.

However, I did not find evidence that anyone was ever directly refused access to sick call. In fact, many statements indicate that Drill Instructors sincerely sought men who might be ill and even took some to the hospital in their own cars. One commander became so concerned that he brought his entire company to the hospital to be checked.

There are several psychological deterrents which work against reporting to sick call.

Many men fear recycling. Recycling is mandatory if a trainee misses five consecutive days of training. It extends basic training and requires that the trainee adjust to a new unit and new personnel.

There is some question whether recycling is adequately explained. It involved placing a trainee at the same stage in training as he was before becoming ill. If by any chance this process is unclear, it should be thoroughly re-explained to all recruits.

I am still awaiting information regarding actual recycling at Fort Wood which will be analyzed.

Other trainees seem to feel that reporting to sick call indicates a lack of manhood. In such cases it may be necessary to literally compel the trainee to go to sick call.

Finally, the language in a letter from Fort Leonard Wood headquarters, dated February 12, gives the impression that there may have been a negative stigma attached to a company if too many trainees report to sick call. The letter states in Par. 3b (2), "(2) Disciplinary measures for individuals seeking medical care are only conducive to increased hospitalization rate and, therefore, not recommended. Sick call and admission rates should not be used to compare units or as an index of efficiency."

Avoidance of sick call should not be a matter of company honor. If it has been one, it should be discouraged. Both Colonel Greer and Colonel Reberry stated that the number of sick calls has no bearing on company competition.

In summary, constant care and effort is required to assure that no procedural or personal obstacles are placed between individual trainees and sick call. In fact, in some instances where the trainee himself resists, his superior may have to compel him.

Was the medical assistance adequate?

The adequacy of medical assistance must be judged by several standards. By most standards, it has been good.

Meningococcal disease is neither a new or unusual disease on Army bases. The Army is aware of the problem as indicated by the Bulletin on Data Pertaining to Upper Respiratory Infections and Meningococcal Disease which states:

"The occurrence of meningococcal disease in our training centers is a well known and established phenomenon. It is here that young men coming from all parts of the country are brought into an environment of close interpersonal relationship, affording an ideal situation for the development and transmission of this disease."

The preventive measures against meningococcal infections can be grouped into two categories: A) chemoprophylactic measures, and B) environmental measures.

Chemoprophylactic measures

A number of investigators early in World War II discovered that the administration of sulfadiazide to a total closed population would stop meningococcal infections. With the administration of only two grams a day or two consecutive days, carrier rates immediately dropped to near zero levels, as did actual cases. This procedure was so effective that it rapidly became routine to administer it to closed populations in the Army as well as to the families of patients.

There was great optimism that meningococcal infections would never again present a problem of any magnitude. Although it was recognized that some strains were less sensitive to this immunization process, the general consensus was that they presented no significant problem.

Beginning in 1963, after sulfadiazine had proved to be a model prophalactic drug for suppressing meningococcal disease via the eradication of meningicocci from the throats of asymptomatic carriers for many years, this method became ineffective because of the increased prevalence of sulfa-resistant strains of meningococci. With the emergence of a sulfadiazine resistant meningococci, this time honored method was rendered totally ineffective and no longer practical.

In 1969, the Army began testing a new vaccine against type C meningococcal disease, producing and testing on a smaller scale a type A vaccine, and developing a vaccine against type B.

The meningococcal group C poly-saccharide vaccine, which combats type C, the only kind reported so far at Fort Leonard Wood, has been tested by approximately 20,000 trainees on six installations throughout the country. Only one has since come down with type C meningitis. In a nationwide test last year of 50,000 non-vaccinated trainees, 38 cases of type C were reported.

In essence, type C vaccine is the only preventive medical measure that can be taken against type C meningococcal disease.

The head of the Preventive Medicine Division at Fort Leonard Wood, Col. Varela, became concerned about the possibility of a meningitis epidemic in early December, and inquired by phone about the use of type C vaccine.

On December 17, Malcolm S. Artenstein, M.D., the Chief of the Department of Bacterial Diseases, sent a letter to Col. Louis B. Edelman of the 5th Army outlining the required procedures for the use of the vaccine at Fort Leonard Wood.

Those procedures were:

"If a program of vaccination were to be undertaken at Fort Leonard Wood it would be done in a similar fashion. I might explain to you the mechanism for obtaining informed consent. The meningococcal vaccine is given during reception period when flu and polio vaccines are administered. Every fifth man (as listed on the roster) is called aside; the vaccine program is explained (by means of a printed poster); vaccine is administered to those who do not refuse it; all men return to the routine immunization lines."

When asked why only one out of five receptees were given the vaccine, Colonels Miller, Varela, and Mosebar pointed to certain problems. In descending order of importance they were:

(1) The vaccine was not available in the quantity necessary to innoculate more than 1 out of 5.

(2) The experimental medical protocol referred to above contained specific procedures.

(3) There was a likelihood that if everyone received type C inoculations, type B would become the prevalent strain. In fact, at Fort Wood one unit with a carrier rate of 80%, had 20% type B strain. Presently there is no effective vaccine against type B. However, the treatment for type B varies little from type C; and therefore would not present any new treatment problems.

Colonels Miller, Varela, and Mosebar expressed their anticipation that if more vaccine had been available as many as 50 to 60 percent of the incoming trainees could be inoculated.

After another call to Walter Reed Hospital from Colonel Varela in late January, it was arranged for the inoculation program to begin on February 11. Two medical specialists came to Fort Wood to assist in the program. Since then some 1,000 trainees have been inoculated on a one out of every five trainees basis and none have contracted meningococcal disease.

In a later telephone conversation, Dr. Malcolm S. Artenstein confirmed that the vaccine was in short supply, with only 6,000 to 7,000 individual doses for the next several months to continue similar inoculation programs at Fort Ord, California and Fort Lewis, Washington.

If more vaccine were available, a modification in the experimental protocol to allow more inoculations at Fort Wood could have been considered, since the Army Investigational Drug Review Board can approve and alter the protocols unilaterally. Protocols are then cleared through the Continental Army Command (CONARC), the 5th Army, and individual post commanders where it would be tested.

Dr. Artenstein noted, in fact, that discussions last fall covered possible expansion of the immunized test group, but that realities of supply made such an expansion impossible.

The short supply of type C vaccine is particularly important, since it is presently the only preventive chemoprophylactic measure that can be taken.

This vaccine was contracted to Squibb Company by Walter Reed Army Hospital so that after the testing is complete, mass production could begin immediately. However, Squibb has decided not to mass produce type C vaccine after the original contract is fulfilled.

Approximately half a million individual doses were called for in the original contract. Delivery was scheduled for the end of 1969. Dr. Artenstein stated that as of March 20, 1970, only about 10% had been delivered. According to Dr. Artenstein, about 450,000 individual doses are presently at the Squibb plant in New Brunswick, New Jersey and have been there for several months. No final delivery date has yet been set.

In summary, the chemoprophylactic measures taken at Fort Leonard Wood appear to have been adequate.

The seriousness of the problem was recognized early and steps were taken. Inoculation began as soon as the vaccine was available and was limited by a lack of vaccine nationally and not a lack of concern by medical personnel at Fort Wood.

The critical need for an effective vaccine to combat spinal meningitis is not limited to the requirements of the Armed Forces. Young children are especially vulnerable to the disease. One-half of the cases occurring in the United States in 1968 (the most recent year for which figures are available) were found in children under age fourteen. Although death rates by age are not available, the mortality rate in 1968 for all persons contracting meningococcal infections was approximately 25%.

The Vaccine Development Advisory Committee for the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Disease (NIAID) has just this week recommended that NIAID proceed with studies to determine the efficacy for use in children of the vaccine developed by the Army at Walter Reed. It was this Advisory Committee that provided the main stimulus for development of a vaccine against rubella, now widely used.

I urge NIAID to respond positively to the Advisory Committee's recommendation and to attach a high priority to programs that will determine whether these vaccines are suitable for use in children. If the vaccines developed by the Army, or modifications thereof, are suitable for civilian use NIAID should exert every effort to promote their commercial production so that there will be ample supplies available to halt outbreaks of meningicoccal infections in the future.

Unfortunately, the Squibb Company, which has acquired a great amount of expertise in the production of this vaccine by reason of its contract with the Army, has rejected the opportunity to undertake its commercial production. Partially through the investment of government funds, this company now has a clearly demonstrated capability to produce Type A and Type C vaccine through large-scale, automated production processes. Because of the delicate fermentation process involved and the careful environmental controls required during production, Squibb's expertise could not be duplicated without a substantial additional investment of time and money. Indeed, I have been informed by authorities in this field that there is perhaps only one pharmaceutical company in the country other than Squibb that has the resident technical staff capable of producing these vaccines on a large scale.

I think it is deplorable that Squibb has seen fit to abandon this extremely promising program at such a critical stage. There has been a great deal of testimony presented to Congress in recent years attesting to the inordinately high prices charged by drug companies for preparations which are vital to the health of many people. It seems to me that this is an opportunity for one of those companies to demonstrate civic responsibility and to make a contribution to the health of America's children and our servicemen by continuing with the development and production of meningococcal vaccines.

Medical supervision of environmental measures

The lack of chemoprophylactic preventive measures makes all the more important the environmental measures stressed throughout this report. The medical team on the base, for instance, recommends that until a vaccine is available, the only preventive measures available are those general measures which prevent or slow down the transmission of respiratory diseases and those general measures which keep up the individual's general resistance to disease."

Implementation of these measures is not and should not be, a primary responsibility of the Fort Leonard Wood medical team. Medical personnel can warn and prescribe what army regulations require, but only individual commanding officers in individual training units can see that regulations are carried out.

Personnel from the Preventive Medicine Division occasionally ran random checks on some companies, but such measures are clearly inadequate to insure strict compliance.

Further and personal action was taken by the head of the Fort Wood Hospital, Colonel Miller, on or about February 13.

During the height of the URI epidemic, top medical personnel reported to Col. Miller that many of the night emergency cases appeared to be exhausted and fatigued. This judgment was confirmed by Col. Miller's own observations of both day and night reportees and discussed among Colonels Miller, Mosebar and Varela. After consultation, Colonel Miller personally called the Brigade Commanders and relayed his observations and expressed his concern.

In a later interview, Colonel Greer, Commanding Officer of the 2nd Brigade stated that after this call extra P.T. and running were discontinued in the 2nd Brigade as a matter of Brigade policy. It should be noted, as stated previously, that this discontinuation came after 26 cases of meningitis were reported at the Fort and one death had occurred.

In summary, the medical team made information or preventive environmental measures available to the training cadre and continued to stress awareness. However, medical staffing was clearly inadequate to check whether these measures were being fully implemented, although some attempts were made. Further, it is not a medical responsibility to enforce such measures and it probably should not be.

Generally, the preventive medical assistance must be judged to be adequate.

Attitude

A great deal of concern was evident among the top hospital personnel. Personal calls to the Brigade Commanders regarding apparent fatigue is a notable example.

The new policy that every trainee reporting to sick call be seen by a doctor, as strongly expounded on by Colonel Mosebar is another. Until late February trainees reporting to dispensaries for regular sick call were seen only by medical aides, unless febrile, in which case they were sent to the hospital to see a doctor. Now one doctor remains at one dispensary after regular sick call hours to insure that everyone reporting, regardless of time or temperature, is seen by a doctor. This change in policy is good and should be retained year-round.

The dispensaries are staffed by young doctors, two to each dispensary during the regular morning sick call. At a staff meeting these doctors indicated that during late January and throughout February the flow of trainees to dispensaries increased. One staff member indicated that at the peak of the URI season 300 to 400 trainees would be seen by doctors at each of the three trainee dispensaries each day. During this period sick call would often run from 6:30 A.M. to 1:00 P.M. Although policy required that the sickest be taken first, this determination is often difficult to make. Several doctors noted that the number of trainees actually ordered to report for sick call also increased during February.

One doctor suggested that a de-emphasis on recycling and discontinuation of the practice that required gear to be packed and stored before reporting on sick call, would contribute to the general health situation.

However, many of his young colleagues differed with him. Generally they felt that the practice of packing and storing gear was only dissuasive to chronic complainers. They saw nothing wrong with making it just a little bit harder to go to sick call and noted although only 5 to 10 percent were "gold bricking," as many as two-thirds of trainees they saw would not come in to see a doctor in civilian life. They noted that they get tired of looking down normal or only slightly aggravated throats and reading normal or slightly elevated temperatures.

The civilian analogy seems less than perceptive. For while civilians can decide their own schedule—whether or not to stay home, keep warm and drink lots of liquids—there is no such freedom of choice in the service. Without a "medical profile" a trainee participates in usually rigorous outside training.

And while there is no evidence to indicate this attitude in and of itself is dissuasive to reporting on sick call it nonetheless is distressing, especially when the Surgeon General states of meningococcal disease "early diagnosis and treatment are the only means to minimize mortality," and Fort Leonard Wood policy states "individuals with early signs and symptoms of disease will be referred to the nearest dispensary. Delayed referral of a sick individual may endanger his life."

General medical treatment

The medical care was judged on the whole to be better than adequate after a full day of investigation at both the new General Leonard Wood Hospital and the so called "old hospital"—a barracks that serves as an annex to the GLWA Hospital. This examination included visits to the various wards, discussions with patients and staff, and questions on procedures and treatment propounded by a noted epidomologist from the faculty of Washington University School of Medicine.

Everyone entering either the old or new hospitals, receives a chest x-ray, a complete blood count, and a urine analysis as standard procedure. URI patients during the URI season are also given a throat culture. This is good operating procedure according to competent medical authorities.

Any trainee with over a 101 degree fever is also admitted automatically. Admissions for trainees with under 101 degrees is left to the discretion of each doctor.

However, some improvements can be made. The new hospital is overcrowded. The old hospital is inadequate. And both hospitals are often understaffed.

The old hospital

The Old Hospital is used to hold and observe URI cases. Some wards have only one dirty shower for 35 patients. Heat and humidity are hard to control. Ventilation is bad. There is some question whether there is adequate space. And although one ward had been waxed and buffed twice on the day it was visited (the usual procedure is once a week), the sanitary facilities still left much to be desired.

It was determined, after interviews with patients there, that most had URI symptoms for several days before reporting to sick call. The old hospital facilities could be one reason for the delay.

Clean up duties fall to patients with under a 99 degree temperature and those who are about to leave the hospital that day according to hospital spokesmen. However, numerous reports indicate that on many occasions this "maximum temperature" mark has been considerably escalated. The 6:00 A.M. temperature reading is usually used to determine the "clean up" detail, even though most doctors agree that early morning readings are usually lower and therefore not the best reflection of general health.

The old hospital is used extensively. In 1968–69 it was open from October until mid-June. This year it opened in October.

Although the old facility is inadequate, by using it to hold and observe URI patients and by sending those with worsening symptoms to the new hospital, it is administered in the most effective way possible. During their stay there, all URI patients receive a cold pack. Aspirin is given upon request if temperatures are under 101 degrees and prescribed if over that.

In summary, although the best is being made of a bad situation, the old hospital is outmoded and should be replaced by an addition to the new hospital.

The new hospital

All the meningitis patients and the more serious URI cases are treated at the new General Leonard Wood Army Hospital. It is an excellent medical facility.

An inspection was made of the emergency room, the lab facilities and the meningitis ward. Ten of the twelve meningitis patients were interviewed. Later in the day the records of two of the meningitis fatalities and one of the other meningitis patients were examined by a faculty member of the Washington University School of Medicine. He was satisfied that everything that could have been done, was done. In fact, it should be noted that the fatality rate for meningitis patients at Fort Wood is less than 8%, far below the national average.

There was consensus reached among meningitis patients and their parents that the treatment in the hospital was good to excellent, with one exception. The parents of Private David Mack, one of the meningitis fatalities, felt that equipment and personnel in the intensive care units were less than adequate. These allegations are attached in Appendix 6 and should be pursued further by the Army.

The intensive care units were also visited. They are located in a small room with four beds and special equipment. The doctors noted that the room was too small, especially when geared to intensive care for all four beds. About $20,000 is required to make improvements that have been under discussion for quite some time. It is an investment well worth making and I intend to suggest it to the Armed Services Committee.

Despite generally excellent facilities and good personnel, the new hospital is overcrowded. It was built for 300 beds with an expansion capability to 391. Presently there are 483.

The previously recommended addition is needed not only because the old hospital is inadequate, but because the new hospital is far too overcrowded.

And both hospitals are often understaffed. The staffing of both hospitals is adequate to handle 500 patients. Yet during the 442 day period from January 1, 1969 through March 8, 1970, the hospital averaged 568.40 occupied beds per day. Over 500 beds were occupied for 380 days. Over 600 beds were occupied for 142 days. And over 700 beds have been occupied for 48 days. Even though some of these beds are occupied by minimal care patients, some returning from Vietnam, more staffing is necessary and should be authorized.

METHODS OF ARMY TRAINING IN VIOLATION OF ARMY REGULATIONS

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, yesterday I sent the Secretary of the Army a letter regarding the situation at Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri. It was the third communication I had sent him on this subject in a week. It urged, in the strongest terms, that the Secretary look into allegations "that methods of training are being used that may well be in violation of Army regulations—and that these methods have caused such a general state of low resistance in the trainees as to make them highly susceptible to such contagious diseases as spinal meningitis and pneumonia."

During the past month 18 soldiers at Fort Leonard Wood have contracted spinal meningitis. Three have died of it. One other boy has died of pneumonia. This is a tragedy. Maj. Gen. W. T. Bradley, commanding officer of Fort Leonard Wood, has stated:

"The occurrence of meningococcal disease in our training centers is a well-known and established phenomenon."

All right. Yet reports from soldiers and their parents indicate that the Army has been lax in dealing with this meningitis crisis. These reports allege that base officials—through at best unthinking and insensitive action and through at worst unconscionable and perhaps illegal action—have increased the likelihood that upper respiratory diseases, often a forerunner of meningitis and pneumonia, would spread, and they have.

I do not make this statement lightly. I have asked three times in 1 week that the Secretary of the Army give his immediate attention to seeing that proper preventive action is taken to stop this mounting death toll and that he investigate the entire situation at Fort Leonard Wood.

The seriousness of the situation goes to the very heart of this Government's responsibilities to our servicemen as they fulfill their responsibilities to the Nation.

In the past 2 weeks, reports of exhausting duty, extensive harassment, and inadequate medical assistance at Fort Leonard Wood have come to my office. As I stated in a letter to the Secretary of the Army on February 23:

"I have received some mail concerning conditions at Fort Leonard Wood. The mail not only deals with the meningitis cases at Fort Leonard Wood, but also, and just as importantly, the overly exhaustive routine which the trainees are required to perform which weakens their physical condition to the point that they are susceptible to serious illness. These letters indicate that the men are often awakened at 4:00 a.m. and do not return to their barracks until 9:00 p.m. at which time they are then obliged to do all of the bunk details, shoe shining, cleaning up, etc. One letter indicates a situation where a trainee had an 18 hour K.P. duty and then on successive nights guard duty and fire watch duty."

There have also been disturbing reports about the adequacy of medical assistance, harassment of soldiers who go to the hospital, and of alleged intimidation of soldiers from going on sick call.

It was only yesterday that I learned about the trainee at Fort Leonard Wood who died February 17 of pneumonia. The St. Louis Globe Democrat interviewed Pvt. Burman Dyer, whose wife is critically ill with meningitis after visiting him at the base February 22. Private Dyer told of the circumstances surrounding the death from pneumonia of Pvt. Larry Breeling, a 4-year enlistee and a member of his company.

According to Dyer, Breeling became ill in early February and was sent to the base hospital where his condition was diagnosed as pneumonia. Dyer said of Breeling:

"They gave him penicillin and sent him back on duty within 24 hours. He could not take his physical training test when he came back. He was still too sick."

Dyer stated that 2 nights later he and some members of his company discovered Breeling apparently delirious in his bed. Once again I quote:

"He was screaming and shouting and yelling for them to leave him alone. A sergeant who was in charge of our building that night told us to quiet him down or else he was asking for a court martial."

The next morning Breeling was discovered dead in his bed.

This is not an isolated instance.

Pvt. Steven G. Lagermann died of meningitis on February 24. In the last letter he wrote to his parents before his death he stated:

"Mom, is there any possible way you could get me some of those penicillin pills? I found out that at least one guy died here because his resistance was so low . . . so to save our lives we need the medication . . . you go to the hospital and they give you two aspirins and send you back into the field . . . there were only 125 in the field today out of 220 . . . rest are sick."

Lagermann's father said that in a telephone conversation with his son, Steven stated:

"You have to have at least a 104 degree temperature before they would pay any attention to you."

The St. Louis Post Dispatch stated that about 400 trainees a day are being treated for respiratory ailments. Spokesmen for the Army at Fort Leonard Wood acknowledged that hospital admissions for upper respiratory infections—running 100–150 a day in mid-February—have been reduced. However, from most accounts, many are inadequately treated and others fear harassment in the hospital if they go on sick calls.

The father of Pvt. Henry Iglauer, who died on February 11 of meningitis, wrote me on February 17:

"Henry died last week, and I am enclosing a clipping from the St. Louis Post Dispatch, of some of the details. I am writing you, however, because in all our grief and in our loss of our only son, we would like to do something about protecting the rest of the men at Ft. Leonard Wood.

"In the last week we have had ample opportunity to talk to enlisted men, junior and senior officers alike, and the stories we can piece together from their comments are unbelievable in the 1970's. The treatment of these young men—the youth of our country—is actually inhuman. Neither did my son have, nor do we have any objection to physical fitness. My son enjoyed the rigors of creating and keeping a healthy body. But the Army is tearing down step by step, day by day, the physical being of the men under their command. The biggest complaint of everyone there is the lack of sleep which these men suffer.

"Men are being scared not to go on sick call because 'if they miss 5 days of duty they will be re-cycled and have to start all over again.' Men are told in the very beginning that if they go on sick call they have to pack up all their belongings and return them to the supply depot first, before they can go on sick call. This is a chore when you are well. Much more so when you are sick."

Mr. Iglauer also told me that one of his son's friends told him of a soldier in the hospital with measles and 101 degree fever. On the second day he was told to mop the floors in the hospital. I have been told of similar situations by other reliable sources.

The situation at Fort Leonard Wood necessitates an immediate and full investigation. After three letters I have still not received the courtesy of a reply from the Secretary of the Army or from anyone on his staff. However, I am not concerned with courtesy or governmental amenities, but rather with action.

I want to know if the accepted procedures in dealing with an outbreak of meningitis, as described by the Office of the Surgeon General, were followed. These procedures call for the hospitalization of those with a fever of over 99.6 degrees. They call for an evaluation by the post surgeon and a reduction of the total number of hours of training. They call for an increase in hot meals. Were these procedures followed? If not, why not?

I want to know if Army regulations have been broken. Have these men been denied adequate rest? Has medical attention been adequate? Was a man suffering from pneumonia released from the hospital? Why was not a man suffering from a delirium brought in? Does harassment occur in the hospital or retaliation occur upon leaving?

In the last 4 days I have received many letters and phone calls from parents of inductees and reservists and the men themselves, asking if they should report to Fort Leonard Wood. They ask me, "What should I do?" How can a public official with serious doubts about the situation at Fort Leonard Wood answer such a question? I honestly do not know.

These and other questions must be answered, and answered fully, completely and promptly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD my correspondence with Secretary of the Army Resor, including my letter to him dated February 23, 1970, my telegram to him of February 27, 1970, and my letter to him of March 2, 1970.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., February 23, 1970.

Hon. STANLEY R. RESOR,
The Pentagon,
Arlington, Va.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Enclosed you will find a Xerox copy of a news article from the February 13, 1970 issue of the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

I have received some mail concerning conditions at Fort Leonard Wood. The mail not only deals with the meningitis cases at Fort Leonard Wood, but also, and just as importantly, the overly exhausting routine which the trainees are required to perform which weakens their physical condition to the point that they are susceptible to serious illness.

These letters indicate that the men are often awakened at 4:00 a.m. and do not return to their barracks until 9:00 p.m. at which time they are then obliged to do all of the bunk details, shoe shining, cleaning up, etc. One letter indicates a situation where a trainee had an 18 hour K.P. duty and then on successive nights guard duty and fire watch duty.

Mr. Secretary, I was an enlisted man in the U.S. Navy and I realize that there is always some griping by recruits, etc. I personally used to "gripe like hell."

However, the tone and tenor of the mail to which I have referred, in my judgment, transcends the routine or expected gripe. In my judgment, it indicates the possibility of some substantial problems at Fort Leonard Wood which need attention and improvement.

I respectfully ask that with all due haste you examine both the health status and the physically exhausting training rigors as they have existed or do continue to exist at Fort Leonard Wood.

Yours very truly,

THOMAS F. EAGLETON,
U.S. Senator.

Hon. STANLEY R. RESOR,
Secretary, U.S. Department of the Army, The Pentagon, Arlington, Va.

MR. SECRETARY: I have just received a report of the third death this month of a recruit at Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri, from spinal meningitis. Fourteen other cases have been reported this month, and there were nine cases in January.

In light of the obvious crisis that exists, I urgently request that preventive action be taken immediately to avert the possibility of any further deaths, and I further request that an immediate investigation be ordered by your office of conditions at the base, including methods of training, as I requested in my letter to you February 23, to which I have not yet received a reply.

This investigation must be made with all possible speed to determine whether conditions at the base contributed to the current health situation and whether changes and improvements must be made.

THOMAS F. EAGLETON,
U.S. Senator.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., March 2, 1970.

Hon. STANLEY R. RESOR,
Secretary, U.S. Department of the Army, The Pentagon, Arlington, Va.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Since my telegram to you last Friday it has been revealed in the press that another trainee at Fort Leonard Wood died in February—this time of pneumonia—bringing the total number of deaths at the base last month to four, three of them from spinal meningitis.

It was also disclosed this morning in a St. Louis newspaper that the wife of another trainee is in critical condition with spinal meningitis apparently contracted after a visit February 22 at Fort Leonard Wood with her husband, who is in basic training there.

This woman is a teacher at a high school with more than 4,100 students and taught for four days after visiting her husband before becoming visibly ill. School officials are now worried she may have infected some of the students.

It is my information that hundreds of cases of respiratory infections are now being treated daily at Fort Leonard Wood. Base spokesmen continually are quoted as saying that nothing unusual is occurring. I don't think they can be believed.

For a week now I have been getting an increasing number of letters and phone calls from the parents of boys now undergoing basic training at Fort Leonard Wood. These letters and phone calls consistently allege that methods of training are being used that may well be in violation of Army regulations—and that these methods have caused such a general state of low resistence in the trainees as to make them highly susceptible to such contagious diseases as spinal meningitis and pneumonia. I outlined some of these to you in a previous letter.

Letters written home before their deaths by two of the meningitis victims are revealing—and they should not go unheeded.

I have received calls from parents whose sons told them as recently as yesterday that trainees are still being intimidated from going on sick call—and this with more than 25 cases of spinal meningitis reported in the last two months, with four young men dead, with base officials admitting they have a high incidence of respiratory disease among trainees.

Even sick call may not be of much help. The young man who died of pneumonia was allowed a very short stay at the base hospital and then was sent back to his barracks—where he died within two days.

The facts are serious. So are the reports I have received from the worried parents of trainees about the type of training their sons have been forced to undergo. In light of the facts, these allegations warrant an immediate and extensive investigation, and I again request that you order that an investigation be made.

Yours very truly,

THOMAS F. EAGLETON,
U.S. Senator.

Mr. SYMINGTON subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier this morning I was at a meeting of the Committee on Armed Services, which heard for the first time the distinguished Secretary of the Army and Chief of Staff, General Westmoreland. Therefore, it was not possible for me to be in the Chamber when my distinguished colleague, Senator EAGLETON, delivered a short address with respect to the problems we now face at the Army encampment at Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri.

I want to commend my colleague for his logical and constructive interest in this matter. We have had an epidemic of meningitis there, and four tragic deaths.

What the Senator has done guarantees that the matter will be looked into by the Army; and I have already requested, as a member of armed services, that they do so.

A VERBATIM ACCOUNT OF THE NEWS CONFERENCE HELD BY REPRESENTATIVES RICHARD ICHORD, DURWARD G. HALL, AND WILLIAM J. RANDALL AT FORT LEONARD WOOD, MO., MARCH 6, 1970

ICHORD. I would like to make an opening statement. Then I will yield to the ranking minority member, Doctor Hall and to my colleague, Mr. Randall, on my right.

The recent meningitis cases here at Fort Leonard Wood with the attendant national publicity has prompted the chairman of the full committee of the House Armed Services Committee to appoint a subcommittee to look into the situation, thus our visit here today. I was designated as chairman. My colleague from Missouri, Bill Randall, and Dr. Hall on my right were appointed members. All three of us, of course, are very much concerned because each of us have constituents here at Fort Leonard Wood. I am particularly grateful that my colleague Bill Randall and Dr. Hall would choose to serve on this subcommittee. Of course, Fort Leonard Wood is in my own congressional district and I, for that reason, would have more concern than most members of Congress. I am particularly obligated to Dr. Hall because I know he had other plans made and he did consent to come down here to look into this very important problem. We brought with us from Washington today Dr. Winter from the Office of the Surgeon General. There are also preventive medical people from Fifth Army Headquarters here at the post today. We have been briefed. We have subjected the authorities here at Fort Leonard Wood to very close questioning, including the medical authority, and I have been assured by them and am convinced that everything possible is being done to bring meningitis under control. All standard procedures have been invoked and I am very happy to find that these procedures were invoked before we arrived. With that opening statement I will yield to my colleague, Dr. Hall.

HALL. Well, thank you Mr. Chairman. First of all, I think in proper context we must realize that meningococcus meningitis is one of the regular recurring diseases that breaks out in a skin rash. In the profession, we call it one of the eczematours. The principal sign and the first recognizable sign outside of the vague headaches and aches and pains, is a skin rash. There are many fulminating types of this contagious meningitis. Some of it comes and goes, but worst of all, in different years it is more virilent than in others. Further complicating the factor is the usual miracle drugs which we referred to so proudly in the 50's, the germs, the meningococcus, in this case, have developed an attenuation for and are resistant to the drugs and we can not give mass medication and prevent it in a place where men are brought together as they are in a training camp. There are certain prophylactic measures that we know that can be exercised and brought into play, including: additional rest, more airation, certain prophylaxis with the onset of colds, not bringing people together and all of these things that are difficult in a training camp where you have an input of maybe 1,100 or more new recruits or receptees in our training system a week. This is quite different from the advent of college one time a year, in the fall, where they all develop their immunities at the same time together even though it is a new group of people. I certainly join with the chairman in being pleased to find first of all on arrival that for the past two or three days there have been people here from the epidemiological board, from the Fifth Army, from the Office of the Surgeon General and elsewhere who are specialists in preventive medicine and these techniques I am even more pleased to find that even before that, General Bradley, your own staff had instituted the regular standard operating procedures. Now, this is a bad disease and it is bad to have to bring people together in time of war, undeclared or otherwise, for the purpose of training. But, everyone including the public whom I think has been over messaged and exercised and riled up by unfortunate questions and statements before people even determined whether all the standard operating procedures had been placed in effect or not were beneficial and had been adopted. I think they have been. I think we may have some more lumps as this respiratory disease season passes out. I hope and pray that we have no more losses but it is better to train and it is better to institute these procedures and continue than it is to turn out troops who are not trained in a manner so that they can defend themselves or so that indeed they will be enured against infection when they reach their theatres of combat. So, I have optimism, I give thanks and appreciation. I certainly have the hope and faith and belief that the worst of this is over and that we have done everything that is known in the present state of human science to help each other and I hope that the epidemic is waning. There are other epidemics in other camps, in other stations. They, too, are being handled well. This will be beneficial and who knows but out of it may come the discovery that will prevent this eczematous from recurring when we bring men together for training in the future. I think that is all I would have to say, Mr. Chairman, until time for questions and answers.

ICHORD. Congressman Randall.

RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, at the very beginning, well, first I would like to say that I concur generally with my two colleagues but, before we go into any further discussion I want to express the gratitude of the subcommittee to General Bradley and all of the other military personnel here today. They have been very cooperative. They have taken us all to the area we needed to see. We have been to the hospital. We have been to all the barracks. We have been to the field, the bivouac areas. We have had a full day here. I have talked to several of our own constituents, the troop personnel and I get the report from them that they are not fearful of the infection. They realize it is here, they suggest that they are going ahead and training just as they have been. I have the feeling that the maximum is being done to get on top of this. I believe our colleagues may have mentioned that the Army has been on top of this before we got here—both the Surgeon General of the Army and also Fifth Army. One of the principal witnesses before us today pointed out that in spite of the worried parents, the servicemen themselves have a fine espirit de corps, that they are particularly dedicated young men. I was very much impressed with one of the statistics of the trainees here on the base. A high percentage of them are college graduates, about 25 percent. They understand why they are being trained and they have pride in their units. As we looked about on the base today we found such slogans as, "We're Second to None," and "We Strive for Perfection." I was convinced that the medical staff is dedicated. There is no doubt about that. They are hard working. They are working in good faith—and that applies to the medical staff and non-medical people who are working with a hard problem. This is a very hard problem. We are wrestling with a disease that we really do not know all about yet. It is a seasonal matter. It is a matter, as Dr. Hall suggested, that is drug resistant. Now, all the standard procedures are being followed. The Army was, as I said, working before we get here and we are glad to hear that. I hope that the epidemic has reached its peak and we believe that with the passage of this month that the worst may be over. I would hope that the command would keep a careful surveillance over the lower echelons to be sure that the eight hours sleep is observed. Now, I know that is the order, they get eight hours sleep. But, there may be some instances where some acting MCOs get overzealous and want to shave that off a little bit. I would hope that would be carefully carried out—that order which has been issued by the higher command. I would also hope that there would be surveillance to try to screen out those who are really sick and need treatment because of the nature of the malady we are wrestling with, and those who may simply want to go on sick call to avoid strenuous physical training. Mr. Chairman, I concur generally with the findings of the Chairman and Dr. Hall.

ICHORD. Thank you Mr. Randall. Gentlemen, we would be happy to answer any questions that you might have. When you direct your questions please mention the name of the gentleman to whom you direct the question, including General Bradley.

QUESTION. Mr. Ichord, what did your committee see today?

Answer, ICHORD. We have met with General Bradley, briefed first of all by General Bradley. We have met with the chief medical officer of Fort Leonard Wood, Colonel Miller. We have been briefed by the brigade commander, Colonel Greer, of the Company C, where the two deaths occurred. We subjected them to intensive questioning. We have visited Company C. We talked to the company commander. We have talked to the men of Company C. We have also been to the hospital and talked to Colonel Miller and his staff and subjected various questions that we had to those individuals.

QUESTION. Mr. Ichord, did you feel that one day is enough time to investigate fully?

Answer, ICHORD. Well, of course, if you are asking whether or not we would attempt to separate all of the facts from the fiction that is surrounding this whole matter, no, it would be impossible for me to do that in a one day period of time.

QUESTION. I would like to question Dr. Hall, please. Senator Eagleton suggested that the health techniques here left something to be desired. Did you find this to be the case in your visit to the medical facilities today?

Answer, HALL. Well now, if you can figure out what Senator Eagleton had in mind when he said any health facility left something to be desired then maybe I could answer your question. I certainly do not know and I think there has been too much flag waving and spring board of publicity seeking by non-technical people about a very technical matter, the techniques of which I am thoroughly satisfied with within the present state of the art including epidemiology and immunology. I do not know what the junior Senator based his speech or his claims on. I understand he was personally impressed, but we have looked at the records. I have been on the intensive care ward. I have been on the less intensive care wards. I know the time that has been spent, the priorities and emphasis that are being given, the techniques that are being used and they are a maximum exercise not only of the state of the art but of the state of the science in prevention and certainly in treatment. I did not talk to a single ill soldier or his parent who was not satisfied that they are receiving the maximum benefit of the most skilled and available care that they could. Does that answer your question?

QUESTION. I would like to direct this question to Dr. Hall. There has been a number of allegations that trainees are not allowed to seek medical attention here through one means or another. There has been a charge made that you have to have a 104 degree temperature before you can get on sick call and that sort of thing. Are you satisfied, Dr. Hall, as a medical doctor, that there is no hitch in a soldier seeking medical attention and receiving it?

Answer, HALL. First of all, I used to hear these things when I was a company training commander myself. That was some 20 . . . well, it is longer ago than I like to think about and I might have been outdated, so this entire committee went particularly into this question, both with the command and with the troops. In fact, I went up and down the list of those waiting in the dispensaries that were still operating today when we reached there and furthermore, at the hospital. I broke away from the rest of the group and went with friends of mine in the profession up and down the aisle of those waiting to see how long they had waited, whether they had had trouble getting by their "Top Kick" in order to go to the dispensary and get on the sick list in the first place or not, how long they had had to wait, whether they were getting good service and I did not find any instances of displeasure or regret. I can say categorically that in this dispensary set-up I feel it is adequate for the battalions, for the brigade training centers, and that the rule is not that you have a temperature of 104 to be admitted to the hospital, but that if the temeprature is above 100 it is almost an automatic ticket for admission and this was in effect starting last October with increased personnel and increased precaution. Head to feet sleeping in the same room, increased aeration space, reducing those in squad rooms from eight to seven to get the required cubic footage of air and all of these other precautions which are all we know about how to prevent this disease. I think there has not been unusual exercise of duress in training. Quite the contrary, I believe the command function of maintaining the health of the troops has been out ahead of this epidemic. But, we are up against a tough one which is developing some fulminating cases that no one knows how to treat.

QUESTION. Dr. Hall, did you find that the men in your opinion are receiving the proper amount of sleep and receiving all the major personal hygiene measures necessary to prevent upper respiratory infection?

Answer, HALL. I think within the command decision of balancing off the need for training before these men are committed for their future involvements with the necessity of sleep and the necessity of actual extra rest, including compensatory time when, because of their training, they do miss a night's sleep that I am satisfied about this.

RANDALL. I just want to supplement that point. We are all, I am sure I speak for the chairman, Mr. Ichord, and I know for myself, that we are very fortunate to have with us a colleague who is both a member of the House Armed Services Committee and also a former practicing physician. I might add in connection with our visit to the hospital, the doctor was on one part, some of us in another. We personally questioned each one of those who were in a room waiting to be treated at the hospital and we found that about half of them had not come through their dispensary, but had come direct. So, there is certainly no one barring them from coming to the hospital.

HALL. May I add one other sentence, Mr. Chairman, in that regard. That is, I want to assure the people that we have reviewed the individual cases including the hospital records, the dispensary records and the company rosters of these whom we have unfortunately lost with the dread disease. They were more than adequately cared for and we still lost.

QUESTION. Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct this question to Congressman Randall. Congressman Randall, do you feel that the Army reacted soon enough with these extraordinary measures?

RANDALL. Well, of course, we did not have knowledge of what they had been doing except when we got into this the first of the week. I certainly could find no evidence here today. This is a seasonal matter and we had testimony that they started conferences way back in October with these provisions for reduction in the extent of physical training and insistence upon eight hours of sleep. That was our testimony. We feel that they recognized that it is not a question of January and February, it is also December and they were taking some of these steps in December.

ICHORD. I would add to that by saying that the authorities did institute an instructional program down to the company level as far back as October, which is the beginning of the meningitis season. Also, an immunization program was early instituted. As I stated before, I am firmly convinced that everything is being done that is possible and should be done to bring this matter under control.

QUESTION. I would like to direct my question to General Bradley. General, the committee seems in agreement that there is an epidemic condition existing on the base. Shouldn't, in the best public interest, we seriously consider placing the base off limits to visitors until this problem has peaked, as Mr. Randall states it?

BRADLEY. No, sir, I think not. We must, and have, considered various measures of quarantining or isolating various elements at every stage. And, it has been our considered judgment that this is not necessary. There was one isolation of one company for a five-day period shortly after they had five cases of meningitis occur in their company. Since then, we have not had any concentration such as that.

QUESTION. I am referring, General, to this woman from the St. Louis area who visited the base and then became ill with meningitis shortly after. Can't we expect that this may happen again?

ICHORD. I might add there, General, and I do not want to underestimate the seriousness of the situation. There are some serious meningitis cases in the hospital at the present time, but I would concur with Dr. Hall's opinion that this matter has been blown completely out of proportion in my opinion. For example, my wife almost imposed a wifely quarantine on me if I came down to Fort Leonard Wood. That was before she studied a little bit about meningitis and I think I will be able to get into the house when I return to Washington. Dr. Hall, did you have something to add?

HALL. Let me answer that question by saying that we have reviewed the case of the lady in question and I am sure that a post quarantine would not only have kept the press off this afternoon if it had been imposed, which I think you would have objected to violently, but this lady does not have epidemic meningitis or even a meningoccal infection. She has the hemophilic influenza type of meningitis which is quite different. It is not associated with, is not contagious and so forth. Now, this is where one can get into trouble by assuming without knowing technically the difference. We could give you other cases that have allegedly been caught at Fort Wood, but are not even meningitis and which in no way could be associated with epidemic meningococcus infection let alone meningococcus meningitis.

QUESTION. This is a question for Dr. Hall. Doctor, you mentioned going to the hospital and talking with men and their families and none of them were dissatisfied with the care that they are having. I would like to ask, did you talk with any of the men who had meningitis or with any of their families?

HALL. Yes, these were the ones I was specifically referring to on the intensive care ward as late as this afternoon, including some of these who had to hold their fingers in their tracheotomy tube in order to talk and answer and express their thankfulness for many things, and indeed, those people should be thankful because they have had a very close shave. This is a very fulminating type of this particular recurrent seasonal epidemic.

QUESTION. I would like to direct this question to General Bradley. At any time during this discussion, General Bradley, has Senator Eagleton been in contact with the command at Fort Leonard Wood. Has he verified any of the allegations made in letters that he released on the Senate floor?

BRADLEY. Not in recent dates.

QUESTION. What do you mean, General, by, "in recent dates?"

BRADLEY. Subsequent to my understanding that he has asked that this matter be looked into, I have not corresponded with him or heard from him directly.

QUESTION. Congressman Ichord, did you discuss the case of Private Larry Breeling?

ICHORD. Yes, that was discussed. However, on all of these things, I am not going to, as I stated before, to attempt to separate fact from fiction and to go into all of the rumors with just one day's investigation. If I were to do that I would require five or perhaps six days and certainly choose a different way of proceeding than we have today. But, I have heard all kinds of rumors on this matter. As a matter of fact, I was advised before I left Washington that the little 11-year-old girl from Centralis had died of meningitis who had visited relatives here on post. I have ascertained today that she actually died from viral encephalitis, I believe. So, we have asked questions about many of these rumors, many of these allegiations, all of them that were brought to our attention. But, I'm not going to attempt to make any conclusive finding in regards to any of these things today and I think I have adequately explained the reason why.

QUESTION. Congressman Ichord, did you find any evidence that fear or threat of recycling was keeping the man from going on sick call?

ICHORD. Actually, I questioned at least six men from Company C in that regard. They related to me that they were very much concerned during the first cases, now they have been informed about meningitis and I would point out that we have an educational television system here and just a few minutes ago information went out to the troops themselves. I did not find that they were concerned. Now, of course, you would have to get into the individual cases. They do have a policy of if you miss five days, I am sure this is not a hard and fast rule, that would be five consecutive days, that you may have to be recycled. Some of the individual troops, I think, would be concerned about that and others might not. You have to look into the individual himself.

RANDALL. I would like to supplement that by saying that we talked to the same six and four of those six had been in the hospital. I talked to a boy from Colorado and he said yes, several months ago that fear did exist, but word is now among the troops that it does not make such difference, you are going to start right in another class. We do not regard that as saying you are going to be recycled would dissuade us from going to the hospital.

HALL. Of course, they recycle automatically also if they do not shoot 30 the first day they are on the target range.

QUESTION. Congressman Ichord, what will be your subcommittee's recommendation to Congressman Rivers' committee?

Answer, ICHORD. We will report to congressman Rivers substantially what we have related here today. We will tell him in the report that we think everything possible is being done to bring this matter under control. As far as anything additional, I have no specific recommendations in mind at this time. I would also like to point out that we were advised that the physical training requirements have been released since the outbreak of meningitis, which I think was a good policy because of the association of fatigue with this particular disease.

RANDALL. Couldn't we add to this report that we commended both the command the dedicated medical people that have worked on holiday schedule, 12 to 14 hours a day or around the clock when necessary. And, I'm now speaking especially of the nurses, corpsmen and all who have helped in the hospital and in the dispensaries in order to try to alleviate this epidemic. I think we can certainly add that. And, I would like to add a word for the non-medical people who have realized all along the seriousness of the problem they are facing here—the command and the different echelons of the command.

QUESTION. What would you say to concerned parents, in a word or two?

Answer, ICHORD. Well, I would not underestimate or understate the seriousness of the situation, but I think that they can rest assured that the authorities here at Fort Leonard Wood, the medical authorities here at Fort Leonard Wood, are doing everything possible to control this outbreak of meningitis and I would point out that only a few small percentage, less than one half of one percent, of the 30,000 troop compliment here have been infected with anything resembling this disease.

RANDALL. Actually, the figure, I recall is 2/10ths of one percent.

ICHORD. It would be less than one half. Yes, it would be 2/10ths. There have been 29 cases since the first of January. There have been 40 cases since the beginning of the season, which began last October.

Thank you, gentlemen.

MILITRAY POLICE REPORT

From: Provost Marshal, Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., 20 Feb. 70.

Subject: Breeling, Larry W., [redacted], E–4–2FLW.

COMP stated that he tried to wake VIC up. COMP noticed that VICT was not breathing. COMP checked pulse and found out that VIC didn't have any. COMP notified Drill Sergeant who in turn notified the Military Police. VICT was conveyed to GLWAH where he was pronounced dead by Maj. Harman Urbano. At 0840 hours, 19 Feb. 70, Maj. Lesliea Torgenson, [redacted], Patholcgist.

General Leonard Wood, Army Hospital, was contacted in reference the autopsy of SUBJ. Maj. Torgenson stated that autopsy revealed that SUBJ died from pneumonia, and at the present time they had two cultures growing from the samples taken from the lungs to determine the severity of the pneumonia.

Witnesses to the death are:
Alspough, James R., [redacted].
Downes, Charles, Jr., [redacted].
English, Don W., [redacted]
Dolton, Stephen W., [redacted].
Cockrell, Randall S., [redacted].
Christiansen, Robert D., [redacted].
Burris, Robert W., [redacted].
Childress, Gerald R., [redacted].
Carter, John Alden, Jr., [redacted].

WITNESS STATEMENT OF DOWNES, CHARLES, JR.

Mr. Breeling was breathing hard and having pains at 9:00 p.m. last nite, 2–17–70. When we got up this morning, I was about the first one up. I noticed Mr. Breeling was quite pale and not breathing that I could see. I moved closer and took his wrist and could find no pulse or heartbeat, he was cold and his arm was stiff already. I went down to our Platoon Sergeant (Jack Carter) and had him notify someone downstairs such as drill sergeant, S.D.I., etc.

WITNESS STATEMENT OF ALSPAUGH, JAMES R.

I went to bed at 8:30 last night and noticed that he was asleep and breathing a little heavy.

WITNESS STATEMENT OF BURRIS, ROBERT D.

I checked on Mr. Breeling to see what was wrong with him at about 6:00 p.m. He was having a hard time breathing and there was something wrong with his legs. I asked if he wanted anything and he said no.

I went to bed at 8:30 and I must of fallen asleep in about 15 or 20 minutes. That's the last I heard of him. He was breathing heavy.

Last saw victim alive at 8:30, heard victim breathing heavily at about 2:00 in the morning.

While on fire guard last night between the time's of 9:30 to 10:30, I heard Breeling throwing up so I enter the room he was laying over the side of the bed throwing up in a Butt-can. I ask him if he wanted to go to the latrine he said no, so I held him there for a moment then I went to get a cold compact. I placed it on his head and layed him on his back, I asked if he wanted something, he said no so I left him, at this time he was breathing pretty hard.

WITNESS STATEMENT OF RANDALL S. COCKRELL

I saw the victim alive at 8:30 last night when I went to bed. He was breathing real heavy and was sick. I awakened several times during the night and he was still breathing hard but I have no idea what time it was because I didn't have my watch on.

WITNESS STATEMENT OF CARTER, JOHN A.

Last night at about 1800, Pvt. Breeling, after taking a make up PT test, was having problems breathing and having bad cramps in his legs. He spit out phlegm. Then seemed to quite down and rest easily. He said he was doing all right. I left at about 1830 and checked several times later on, seeing that he was doing all right.

Between 1800 and 1830 he said he was hot and then cold. Talking deleriously of "getting even" with the DI who made him run back from the PT test.

WITNESS STATEMENT OF GERALD RAY CHILDRESS

I got back from chow last night about 6:00 and found him rolling in pain on his bunk. (He had just gotten back from the hospital with pneumonia Sunday.) I asked him what was wrong and he said he was all cramped up. I asked him where and he said his legs, under the kneecap mostly. (He also was having trouble breathing.) I started trying to massage his legs, and he said they felt better. He had a small fever, so I covered him up to try and keep him warm. He was all right, sleeping for about the next half hour. Then he woke up and said he was hot, so I put a cold towel on his head and massaged his legs some more. He wanted some water so I let him have some water. Then he laid back down and went to sleep. About a half hour later he leaned over the bunk and vomited into a can. So I rewet the towel and he said his legs hurt so I massaged them some more. At this time he complained of a severe headache. He then rolled over and went back to sleep. After about 15 minutes he got up and went to the latrine. He then came back and just kind of fell into bed. I asked him if he was feeling better and he said yes. After that about every 20 minutes he would wake up and vomit. I'd wipe his head and cover him back up. At 8:30 I went to bed. I woke up about ten and heard him breathing heavily. I got up and asked him how he was and he said his head hurt so I wiped his head off, covered him back up, and then went back to bed. I woke up at 3:45 and saw Downes standing over him, and then he said he was dead. Somebody went to get Carter, and I tried to see if I could feel or hear any heartbeat. I couldn't, and I felt that he was already ice cold.

Subject. Prevention of Acute Respiratory Diseases.

To See distribution.

From S3, Second BCT Bde.

1. Your attention is invited to comment 1.

2. Recommend this subject be presented to all cadre during one of your scheduled NCO classes for the month of October 1969. The lesson plan attached as an inclosure is forwarded as a guide for presentation.

For the Commander:

JOHN B. OLIVER, Jr.,
Major, Infantry Adjutant.

b. TB MED 274.

c. FM 21–10.

d. FLW Regulation 40–1.

2. In any discussion of diseases of military significance at Fort Leonard Wood, acute respiratory disease of the trainees will emerge as the most prevalent. It has been shown that during the period of the epidemic from October through April, and during an eight-week period encompassing the epidemic, as many as 80% of the trainees acquire the infection. Of these, 50% may require hospitalization and another 20% may require dispensary care. The remainder of the infections are apparently subclinical.

3. To insure that commanders at all levels are aware of this problem, and to facilitate training of personnel under their jurisdiction, the attached lesson plan should be presented at frequent intervals during the period October through April. Particular emphasis should be given to the early recognition of signs and symptoms of disease as described here, and early referral of trainees to the nearest dispensary.

4. The noted references should be available to all cadre personnel to permit further knowledge of this problem than is presented by the lesson plan.

For the Surgeon:

JAMES F. PATTERSON,
Maj., USMC Administrative Officer.

1. Presentation. Lecture, 30 minutes.

a. Introduction. Prevention of Upper Respiratory Infection. Upper respiratory infections (URI) caused by viruses are by far the most important cause of non-effectiveness among trainees; hospital admissions during winter months approach 50% of trainees during the eight week period with an additional 20% requiring out-patient treatment by the unit dispensary.

b. Objective. The objective of this lecture is to familiarize military personnel with some important basic considerations relating to upper respiratory infections and to outline measures to be taken for their prevention and control.

2. Examination.

a. What are upper respiratory infections (URI)? These are diseases of the upper respiratory tract (nose, throat), of sudden onset, usually mild and short lasting (three-four days).

b. What are the signs and symptoms? Fever and chills are the outstanding constitutional symptoms. The average temperature is around 100° F., although it may reach 103° F.; accompanying fever there is usually headache, dry cough, sore throat, burning eyes, nasal obstruction with occasionally a slight nasal discharge and a feeling of general malaise.

c. What causes URI? This disease which has been described almost exclusively in military recruits is caused by a group of organisms known as adenoviruses, so-called because they were originally found on tonsils and adenoids surgically removed. Their relationship was first established in 1954 when type 4 adenovirus was isolated during an epidemic occurring among the troops at this installation. Subsequent investigations revealed most outbreaks of upper respiratory infections are caused by types 4 and 7, although a few cases have also been attributed to type 3.

d. How is the disease transmitted?

Upper respiratory infection, as other respiratory borne diseases, is transmitted from person to person with the sneezing, coughing and talking of infected persons. The causative organisms are contained in invisible droplets or dropping nuclei.

e. Why are they more frequent during the winter months?

The exact cause of the seasonal influx is not clear, however, presumably not one but many factors are involved. There is apt to be a greater amount of crowding, since people tend to gather in inside areas more than they do in the summer months. This crowding gives a better opportunity to pass the infection from person to person.

f. What is the treatment for URI?

There is no specific treatment for this disease except symptomatic care to include bed rest. Complications among hospitalized patients are so rare that there is no need for the prophylactic use of antibiotic drugs.

g. What are the measures to be taken to prevent and control URI?

Individual protective measures are:

(1) Good personal hygiene and cleanliness.

(2) Good general physical conditioning.

(3) Adequate rest providing eight hours of sleep per day for trainees.

(4) Good nutritional state.

(5) Early treatment to preclude the development of complications, such as pneumonia.

(6) Wearing proper uniform, as determined by weather conditions, to avoid overheating.

Envifonmental protective measures:

(1) Provide 72 sq. ft of sleeping space to trainees at all times.

(2) Head to foot arrangement of beds.

(3) Adequate ventilation, temperature and dust control in billets, classrooms and theaters.

(4) Protection of trainees from inclement weather where they are required to wait outdoors to enter facilities.

h. Is there any kind of immunization against URI? There is an effective oral vaccine capable of suppressing URI infections caused by adenovirus type 4. An oral type 7 vaccine will also be available for the first time, for the 1969–1970 season.

1. Presentation. Lecture.

a. Introduction. Prevention of Meningococcal Disease. No infectious agent can kill a human being quicker than the meningococcus. Death has occured in less than two hours from the appearance of the first symptoms.

b. Objective. To familiarize military personnel with the disease and outline the basic principles essential in its control.

2. Explanation.

a. What is meningococcal disease? Meningococcal disease is the invasion of the human body by a bacteria called meningococcus. Once localized in the upper throat the organisms may invade the blood (meningococcemia) and may be finally localized in the membranes covering the brain and spinal cord (meninges) causing inflammation of the same (meningitis). This disease occurs all over the world and may occur at any season although it is most prevalent in late winter and spring. Cases resulting from infection by the meningococcus tend to concentrate among individuals crowded together in such places as military installations, ships, schools, etc.

b. How is the disease transmitted? The mode of transmission is essentially that described for other infections of the respiratory tract or direct contact with the discharge from nose and throat of infected persons usually carriers.

c. What is a carrier and what is its importance in the transmission of meningococcal disease?

A carrier is an infected person who harbors a specific infectious agent, in this case, meningococcus, in the absence of any sign or symptom of disease. Normally the carrier rate among the general population may be as high as 20%. This figure is higher among trainees and at times may reach 70–90%. The probability of cases developing from contact with a patient is no higher than from the healthy population of carriers.

d. What are the signs and symptoms of meningitis?

There are three stages in the development of meningitis:

(1) Localization of the meningococcus in the upper throat where it may multiply abundantly, often without causing any symptoms. If the infection proceeds no further such person is a temporary carrier.

(2) Invasion of the blood stream by the meningococcus (Meningococcemia). The patient appears ill, febrile, a rash often develops characterized by minute red spots throughout the body. On the other hand, the presence of meningococcus in the blood stream may be so mild that the disease never progresses further.

(3) In the majority of cases, the third stage of infection, meningitis, develops. The organism has reached the meninges producing intense inflammation. The first symptom of meningitis usually is vomiting. A severe, bursting headache develops because of inflammation of the meninges and because the pressure of the spinal fluid increases. Stiffness of the neck then develops, due to irritation of the spinal nerves supplying those muscles. The degree of stiffness varies but often the head is retracted. Sometimes the head and spine may be drawn backward like a bow. At this time, mental disorientation is the rule and the patient may progress into coma.

e. How is the disease treated?

Since the clinical picture may change so rapidly anyone having fever, headache, vomiting, stiffness of neck, should be suspected of having meningococcal disease and should be rushed to the hospital. Once the diagnosis is made, treatment consists of chiefly intravenous penicillin in large doses.

f. What is the importance of upper respiratory infection in relation to meningoccocal disease?

A meningococcal infection presumably begins as a localized upper respiratory infection and is often asymptomatic. Thus the importance of early recognition and treatment of upper respiratory infection.

g. How can meningococcal disease be prevented?

The measures of prevention are essentially the same as described for the prevention of upper respiratory infection. In the absence of a drug which may eradicate the infectious agent (meningococcus) from the throat of the high percentage of healthy carriers and thus eliminate the risk of transmission, the real emphasis in control must be placed on the regulations of environmental factor, assuring the minimum of 72 square feet of sleeping space to basic trainees and 55 square feet to others, providing adequate ventilation of sleeping quarters, prescribing head to foot sleeping arrangements, teaching and insisting on the practice of good personal hygiene, encouraging men to report to sick call upon first developing any sign or symptom of an illness, avoiding excessive fatigue and loss of sleep.

PREVENTION OF MENINGOCOCCAL DISEASE AND ACUTE RESPIRATORY DISEASE

Commanding Generals, CONUSA.

1. This letter supersedes letter, ATMED, HQ USCONARC, 11 March 1968, subject: Prevention of Meningococcal Disease.

2. References.

a. Paragraph 1–3, AR 40–5, "Preventive Medicine."

b. Paragraph 8b, AR 210–16, "Bachelor Housing, Officer, Enlisted and Civilian Employees."

c. Paragraph 6, TB Med 274, "Meningococcal Disease."

3. With an increase in meningococcal and acute respiratory disease being reported throughout CONUS, it is appropriate that commanders review preventive measures and insure the following:

a. Control of population density.

(1) Mass troop formations will be kept to a minimum.

(2) Overcrowding will be avoided in troop housing, classrooms, dispensaries and recreation areas where trainees congregate. Where available space permits in classrooms, theaters, or similar facilities, usage of "checkerboard" or spaced seating of personnel is recommended.

(3) A minimum of 72 square feet per man will be provided in billets for each receptee and basic trainee. Individuals other than receptees and basic trainees will be provided a minimum of 55 square feet per man.

b. Limitation of exposure.

(1) Restrict basic trainees to company areas as much as possible during the early weeks of training.

(2) Conduct processing, training, messing, recreational activities and billeting of basic trainees by platoons or companies to the maximum extent possible.

c. Environmental controls.

(1) Maintain adequate ventilation and heating in billets, classrooms and theaters.

(2) Provide shelter from inclement weather for trainees when they are required to wait outdoors to enter facilities.

(3) Ventilate billets in both the reception stations and training companies for a minimum of 48 hours before they are used by new receptees or trainees.

(4) Provide warming tents on ranges and at other training areas where there is prolonged exposure to the elements.

(5) Provide sufficient facilities, such as vacant classrooms, on weekends to prevent overcrowding, when increase in visitors exceeds existing dayrooms and service clubs normal capacity.

d. Sleep.

(1) Assure receptees and trainees an opportunity for a minimum of eight hours sleep nightly.

(2) Receptees arriving at reception stations after 1800 hours will receive only that in-processing which is essential at that time. Formal processing cycle will commence after receptee has been afforded an opportunity for minimum of eight hours sleep.

e. Health education at all levels.

(1) TF 8–3875, "Prevention and Control of Respiratory Disease at US Army Training Centers," will be shown to training center officers and noncommissioned officers and to the staffs of supporting medical facilities. This film will be shown initially as part of the orientation for new training center personnel. The film will be reshown just prior to the start of the usual respiratory disease period. Appropriate at that time would be a short briefing by a medical officer emphasizing signs and symptoms of meningococcal disease and stressing the critical importance of early identification and immediate entry into medical channels of personnel suspected of having the disease.

(2) Officers, drill sergeants, and other cadre members will observe trainees for any indication of illness and if noted insure that the trainee receives medical attention immediately.

(3) A "buddy system" will be instituted so that the trainees observe one another and report any indication of an illness to an officer or noncommissioned officer.

4. Measures which the local commander desires to take, but is unable to because of local conditions or directives from higher headquarters, will be brought to the attention of this headquarters through command channels. Intermediate commanders will take corrective action as resources and authority permit.

For the Commander:

ROBERT H. SCHELLMAN,
Major General, GS, Chief of Staff.

PREVENTION AND CONTROL OF RESPIRATORY INFECTION

1. References:

a. FLW Regulation 40–1.

b. AR 40–5.

c. TB MED 274.

2. There has been appreciable increase in the number of military personnel recently admitted to the hospital for meningococcal and upper respiratory infection. This upward trend requires a definition of objectives and revision of current preventive measures.

3. Pending revision of FLW Regulation 40–1, Prevention and Control of Respiratory Infection, the following will receive immediate implementation:

a. Health education.

(1) All personnel should be familiar with the nature of the disease, the mechanism of transmission and the presenting signs and symptoms. A revised lesson plan is attached.

(2) Each member of the chain of command will receive a program of instruction as outlined by the Preventive Medicine Activity. This program will provide training for trainer cadre to be able to frequently observe their men for early signs and symptoms of disease, supervise adequacy of clothing, personal hygiene and other basic principles of health.

b. Early diagnosis of disease.

(1) Individuals with early signs and symptoms of disease will be referred to the nearest dispensary. Delayed referral of sick individual may endanger his life.

(2) Disciplinary measures for individuals seeking medical care are only conducive to increased hospitalization rates and, therefore, not recommended. Sick call and admission rates should not be used to compare units or as index of efficiency.

(3) The buddy system will be utilized at all times. Each man will help another to look for the first signs and symptoms of respiratory disease and report to sick call at the earliest symptoms of disease.

c. Reduction of disease spread.

Respiratory and meningococcal diseases are transmitted from individual to individual with the discharges from nose and throat of infected persons. Measures which have been effective in reducing this transmission include:

(1) Strict application of platoon or company concept observing integrity through processing, training, messing and billeting.

(2) Restriction of groups upon notification from Installation Surgeon as the potential residence of disease increases.

(3) Avoidance of overcrowding in classrooms, assembly halls and similar facilities where trainees congregate and group intermingling.

(4) Provision of 72 square feet of sleeping space to basic trainees. Effort will be made to provide 72 square feet for permanent party personnel, however, when this cannot be achieved, the minimum for permanent party personnel should not be less than 55 square feet.

(5) Reduction of mass formations to a minimum.

(6) Adequate sanitation of barracks to include wet mopping of floors, airing of bedding, head to foot arrangments, sneeze sheets between beds.

d. Environmental control measures.

(1) Provide adequate ventilation maintaining temperature between 68–72 degrees Fahrenheit in all buildings occupied by troops, and insure close monitoring by periodic checks.

(2) Protection of trainees from inclement weather where they are required to wait outdoors to enter facilities.

(3) Warm-up areas or warm-up tents on ranges and training areas will be provided during the Upper Respiratory Infection season and these will be set up in advance where there is prolonged exposure to the elements.

e. Individual protective measures:

(1) Avoid unnecessary fatigue. Provide eight hours of sleep including compensatory time for night exercises or duty.

(2) Receptees arriving at Reception Station after 1800 hours will receive only that in-processing essential at that time. Formal processing cycle will commence after receptee has been afforded an opportunity for minimum of eight hours sleep.

(3) Encourage good personal hygiene, cover the nose and mouth when coughing. Mouth and teeth cleansing reduce oral and throat bacterial flora. Good general physical conditioning.

(4) Supervision of proper use of clothing to avoid overheating and chilling.

UPPER RESPIRATORY INFECTIONS AND MENINGOCOCCAL DISEASE

LESSON OUTLINE

1. Upper respiratory infection (URI)

a. Presentation

(1) Objective.—The objective of this presentation is to familiarize military personnel with what URI is, how it is transmitted, what the symptoms are, and what specific preventive measures can be taken.

(2) Introduction.—Upper Respiratory Infections caused by viruses are by far the most important cause of lost training time among trainees. Hospital admissions during winter months usually include up to 50% of the trainees during an eight week period, with an additional 20% requiring out-patient treatment by the unit dispensary.

b. Explanation

(1) What are Upper Respiratory Infections (URI)?

These are diseases of the upper respiratory tract (nose and throat), of sudden onset, which are usually mild and short lasting (three to four days). This disease is caused by a group of organisms known as adenoviruses so-called because they were originally found on tonsils and adenoids which had been surgically removed. The organisms's relationship to URI was first established in 1954 when type 4 adenovirus was isolated during an epidemic occurring among the troops at this installation. Subsequent investigations have revealed that most outbreaks of URI are caused by types 4 and 7, with a few cases attributed to type 3.

(2) How is URI transmitted?

Upper Respiratory Infection is transmitted from person to person through the sneezing, coughing and talking of infected persons. The organisms are contained in invisible droplet nuclei which remain suspended in air for hours. This allows the organisms to be breathed in by other individuals. During the winter months there is an increase in cases of URI. This is because there is apt to be a greater amount of crowding, since people tend to gather inside more than they do in the summer months. This crowding gives a better opportunity to pass the infection from person to person. Also, during the colder months, an individual's body resistance to the URI organism is usually lower.

(3 What are the signs and symptoms of URI?

Fever and chills are the most outstanding symptoms. The average temperature of the individual is approximately 100 degrees Fahrenheit, although it may reach 103 degrees Fahrenheit. Accompanying the fever, there is usually headache, dry cough, sore throat, burning eyes, nasal obstruction with an occasional slight nasal discharge, and a feeling of general discomfort.

(4) What are the measures to be taken in order to prevent and control URI?

(a) Individual Protective Measures:

Good personal hygiene and cleanliness.

Good physical conditioning.

Adequate rest providing eight hours of sleep per day.

Good nutrition.

Early treatment to avoid the development of complications, such as pneumonia.

Wearing of the proper uniform, as determined by weather conditions, to avoid overheating.

(b) Environmental Protective Measures:

72 square feet of sleeping space for trainees at all times.

Head to foot arrangement of beds.

Adequate ventilation, temperature (68 degrees to 72 degrees F.), and dust control in barracks, classrooms and theaters.

Protection of trainees from inclement weather when they are required to wait outdoors before entering facilities.

2. Meningococcal disease.

a. Presentation.

(1) Objective: The objective is to familiarize military personnel with what meningococcal disease is, how it is transmitted, what the symptoms are, and what specific preventive measures can be taken.

(2) Introduction.—The seriousness of meningococcal disease must not be underestimated; no infectious agent can kill a human being quicker than the meningococcus. Death may usually occur in less than 24 hours, although it has occurred in less than two hours from the time of the appearance of the first symptoms.

b. Explanation.

(1) What is Meningococcal Disease?

This disease is the invasion of the human body by a bacteria called meningococcus. Once localized in the upper throat region, the organisms may invade the blood (Meningococcemia), and finally may be localized in the membranes covering the brain and spinal cord (meninges) causing inflamation of these membranes (meningitis). This disease occurs all over the world and may occur at any season, although it is most prevalent in late winter and spring. Cases resulting from infection by the meningococcus tend to concentrate among individuals crowded together in such places as military installations, ships and schools.

(2) How is Meningococcal Disease transmitted?

Meningococcal Disease is transmitted like URI: from person to person through the sneezing, coughing and talking of infected persons. The disease is also transmitted through the direct contact with the discharges from the nose and throat of infected individuals.

An infected person who harbors the meningococcus without showing any sign or symptom of the disease is called a carrier. Normally the carrier rate among the general population may be as high as 20%. This figure is higher among trainees, and at times may reach 70 to 90%. The probability of cases developing from contact with a patient is no higher than from contact with the carriers.

(3) What are the signs and symptoms of Meningococcal Disease? There are three stages in the development of Meningococcal Disease:

(a) Localization of the meningococcus in the upper throat region where it may multiply abundantly, often without causing any symptoms. If the infection does not proceed any farther, such a person is a temporary carrier.

(b) Invasion of the blood stream by the meningococcus (Meningococcemia). The patient appears ill, has a fever, and a rash often develops characterized by minute red spots throughout the body. However, the presence of meningococcus in the blood stream may be so mild that the disease never progresses any farther.

(c) In the majority of cases, the third stage of infection develops (Meningitis). Here the organisms have reached the meninges producing intense inflammation. The first symptom of meningitis is vomiting. Then a severe, bursting headache develops due to the inflammation of the meninges and the increased pressure of the spinal fluid. Next, stiffness of the neck develops due to the irritation of the spinal nerves which serve the neck muscles. The degree of stiffness varies, but often the head is drawn back. Sometimes the head and spine may be drawn backward like a bow. At this time, mental disorientation occurs, and the patient may progress into coma.

(4) What are the measures to be taken in order to prevent and control Meningococcal Disease?

The measures of prevention are essentially the same as described for the prevention of Upper Respiratory Infection. In the absence of a drug which can eradicate the infectious agent (meningococcus), the real emphasis in control must be placed on the regulation of the environmental factors: assuring the minimum of 72 square feet of sleeping space to basic trainees, and 55 square feet to others, providing adequate ventilation of sleeping quarters; prescribing head to foot sleeping arrangements; teaching and insisting upon the practice of good personal hygiene; encouraging men to report to sick call upon the first sign or symptom of illness; and avoiding excessive fatigue and loss of sleep.

INQUIRY FROM SENATOR EAGLETON

COMMANDING GENERAL,
USATC Engineer at Fort Leonard Wood,
Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.:

1. Reference: Memorandum for Record, Subject: Senator Eagleton's Inquiry into Health Conditions at Fort Leonard Wood, dated 9 March 1970.

2. Attached as inclosures 1 through 3 are copies of all documents available in this headquarters that pertain to recycle procedures. The documents are attached in chronological order. No documents are available that prescribe policies earlier than 1965. The following is a summary of the information contained in each document:

a. Annex I (Retraining Policies and Procedures) to Section VIII, 2d TRB SOP, dated 21 April 1965.

(1) Paragraph 4 explains the policy in effect at that time which permitted recycle of trainees under the following circumstances:

(a) Absent for more than five consecutive days of training (applicable to all training but range firing).

(b) Absent for five consecutive days of range firing.

(2) The unit commander could retain an individual if he felt that the training missed could be made up within the unit. If, however, it was determined that recycle was necessary, the individual was reassigned commensurate with his level of training.

b. Annex I to Section VIII, 2d Brigade SOP, dated 11 February 1966, paragraph 4 indicates the policy concerning training absences to be the same as that previously cited except that an absence of four consecutive days during marksmanship training constituted grounds for recycle. The unit commander retained the prerogative to keep the individual if he felt that the training missed could be made up in the unit.

c. 2d BCT Brigade Regulation 350–1, Appendix 33, Annex B—Reassignment of Trainees, dated 24 January 1969. Paragraph 3 defines the circumstances which warrant a recycle to be a training absence of 5 consecutive days.

3. Sick Call Procedures:

a. No written policy has been established at brigade level regarding sick call procedures, however, the procedures outlined below are standard throughout all units of this brigade.

(1) At reveille formation those personnel who desire to go on sick call are identified.

(2) Each man going on sick call is issued a "sick slip" containing basic information necessary for use by the local dispensary, i.e., name, rank, SSAN, reason for sick call, etc.

(3) The individual reports to the local dispensary at 0630 and waits his turn to see the doctor.

(4) After seeing the doctor, the individual is returned to his unit (if fit for duty or if given limited duty that may be performed in the unit) or sent to the hospital for further examination and/or admission based on the judgment of the doctor.

b. Trainees may report for emergency sick call at any time. It is, and always has been, the unwritten policy of this brigade that no one is denied sick call. Since the increase in URI and outbreak of meningitis, units have not only been encouraging sick call but all personnel have been alerted to watch for sick men at all times and send them to see a doctor at any time of the day when they appear sick.

4. It is not policy within the 2d BCA Brigade to have a trainee pack his belongings and bedding and carry them to the supply room before going on sick call. In one company this winter (C–5–2) this policy did exist for the first two weeks of the training cycle but was discontinued. This policy was not intended to prevent personnel from going on sick call, but was implemented to carry out the provisions of paragraph 6–3, AR 700–84 which requires that the clothing and equipment of hospitalized personnel be immediately secured in the unit supply room. In the past, a few isolated instances of similar procedures have been found, but were immediately eliminated when discovered. The fact that this policy was used in C–5–2 was contained in a reply, signed by the Commanding General, to an inquiry from Representative Symington on 5 March 1970 regarding the meningitis problem. Before receipt of inquiry letters, a survey of the brigade was made to insure this policy was not in effect. One company was found to be using it—it was stopped.

5. Tab C, inclosure 1 contains current 2d Brigade policy regarding recycle procedures. An individual who misses five consecutive days of training is recycled. He is assigned to a unit in an appropriate week of training so that he may continue training without being required to repeat the entire cycle. This policy has been in effect at least since 1965 with minor modifications as to the amount of training that could be missed before recycle action was necessary (see paragraph 2a, b, c).

HARMONY, R.I., March 4, 1970.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TIERNAN: I am writing with deep concern in my heart for all those boys at Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri. As you know we lost our son on February 22 after a ten day illness with spinal meningitis.

Pvt. David M. Mack, [redacted].

My husband, David's father, spent the most trying days of his life at Fort Leonard Wood watching his oldest son, 20 years old, die. We feel very strongly that the Army is definitely lacking in the field of preventive medicine. The boy had written home several letters referring to poor latrine systems, lack of sleep and lack of vaccine, experimental but better than nothing. He was not the type to complain, I am sure all his comrades will assure you of that. But at a time when a "killer" is on the loose it seems the Army should dole out more humane treatment than they did. I have outlined in red on the copies of Davids letters statements to back up our accusations.

When my husband arrived on Friday the 13th, the terror found amongst the boys seemed like a nightmare. After days of observing and talking to these boys we became even more concerned for their welfare. It seems to be a game of Army regulars playing games with the new recruits, they may say this is untrue, but check these letters closely and I'm sure you, too, will agree with us, much of this harassment is uncalled for.

We feel sorry for the Drs. and nurses who worked so desperately hard to save David, but we cannot forgive the Army for lack of equipment, and lack of trained personnel. It is extremely upsetting when your son's life is dependent on a respirator (ventillator) and people are standing around trying to figure out manuals, as they don't know how to operate it. Also when a boy has hemorrhaged and received over 15 units of blood, to have a lackadaisical blood technician draw blood through his only vein left and forget to irrigate so it too was destroyed. These are just a few of the trying things that happened during Davids last days.

An eeg was requested for over 5 days and due to lack of machine and trained personnel and typical army red tape it was never done—it was too late Monday—David was dead.

We cannot help but to question—what is the worth of a human life—the boys are having severe mental problems awol etc. Many, many have upper respiratory diseases and are not getting adequate attention.

We do hope you will find our plight a worthy one, we are truly concerned about this situation, it is ridiculous in this day and age. Please try to prevent any further tragedies by giving this your consideration our representatives are our only prayer at this time, we are counting on you.

If we can be of any further help, please contact us. Thank you.

Sincerely,

MAURICE and ALYCE MACK.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under the previous order, the distinguished Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG) is now recognized for 15 minutes.

PENTAGON SHOULD RELEASE THE FACTS ABOUT MY LAI ATROCITY

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, Pentagon officials have been withholding important information about the My Lai massacre under the pretext that unless the facts are suppressed "the rights of defendants in current and potential criminal proceedings would be prejudiced." As a result there has been a profusion of rumors and misinformation which is really far more prejudicial to the rights of officers and men who face court-martial trials. More important, it has placed the American people in the position of determining what happened at My Lai on the basis of hearsay and more recently downright false statements.

The citizens of the United States who are paying dearly for the Vietnam war—in lost sons, brothers, and fathers, as well as billions of dollars—have a right to know what our brutal policy has wrought. If hundreds of innocent Vietnamese villagers were murdered at My Lai, the American people should know. They should know if it is true that American officers and GI's participated in murdering civilians—old men, women, children, and babies. Also in committing rape on young girls and women.

Lt. Gen. W. R. Peers and Mr. Robert MacCrate have conducted a thorough and extensive inquiry into the events surrounding the My Lai massacre. The facts they have uncovered would, if released, provide a new perspective on the meaning of American involvement in that immoral, undeclared war in Vietnam. The text of the Peers-MacCrate report is an indictment of American policy as well as of individual Americans.

Mr. President, I assert that this is the real reason the Department of the Army is withholding important facts. Pentagon officials simply do not want the public to have further accurate information which would lead them to the appropriate conclusion that we should withdraw all of our troops from Southeast Asia without delay.

I call upon the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of the Army to release the full Peers-MacCrate report at this time, deleting only the names of the persons involved. This would in no way prejudice the rights of defendants to receive a fair trial. We read daily in the United States, and particularly in our Nation's Capital, of murders and rapes. Knowledge of the facts in these cases has never proved to be prejudicial.

The fact is that the failure of the Pentagon to release the substance and facts of the Peers-MacCrate report has already had serious consequences. Instead of being protected from the truth, the public has been subjected to a series of misrepresentations, misinformation, and mistakes.

Yesterday, the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency of the Senate Judiciary Committee concluded hearings on the influence, if any, of drugs in the atrocities at My Lai. During those hearings no testimony whatever was heard from either Lt. Gen. W. R. Peers or Robert MacCrate who conducted the extensive inquiry into the My Lai incidents. Information in their report could and would have provided conclusive evidence as to any allegation of the influence of drugs at My Lai. It is significant that Stanley Resor, Secretary of the Army, who is extremely knowledgeable and knows all the important facts pertaining to this atrocity, was not called as a witness before the subcommittee. Had he been he would have testified that the My Lai massacre was not related to drugs in any way.

I know the facts, because I was present as a member of the Armed Services Committee when Stanley Resor, Secretary of the Army, testified before us in closed hearing.

Instead of relating facts, one witness made an allegation in the hearing before this subcommittee that a majority of soldiers who had participated in the My Lai atrocity had smoked marihuana at some time or other, some as recently as the night before. There is no basis for this allegation. It is an untruthful statement. I charge that this witness used his imagination or deliberately lied.

The facts are that on the morning that Captain Medina and First Lieutenant Calley who were in direct command of soldiers on the spot, whose mission was to sweep through the village, gave the order to "destroy the village and everything in it." They gathered old men, women, children, and babies in groups. Grenade launchers were hurled into some groups. Captain Medina admitted killing a woman with a rifle shot. He admitted shooting a few inches over the heads of others. Soldiers in his outfit followed his example. Later that morning only three weapons were found in the entire area. Orders given by Medina and Calley were so terrifying that one GI shot himself in the foot to avoid participating. The GI said he just could not take it—the attack on the village. He said, "I gotta get out. I cannot stand this."

Secretary of the Army Resor would have stated before the subcommittee as he has stated on other occasions that this was something new in our national history and experience and he could offer no explanation. When Secretary of the Army Resor testified before a closed session of the Armed Services Committee there were tears in his eyes.

Mr. President, very definitely, this was murder in cold blood of old men, women, children, and babies on order of officers who will be placed on trial in due time.

The Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) sat beside me and said:

I am sick to my stomach. I never knew anything like this to happen before.

As you know, Mr. President, Senator INOUYE lost his right arm in combat in Italy.

It is an untruthful allegation that what occurred at My Lai on that morning was the result of marihuana or smoking pot.

Mr. President, unfortunately, young Americans conscripted into our Armed Forces and following only 4 months training are sent into combat in Vietnam. They are involved in a civil war in a faraway Asiatic land where their officers have brutalized our military effort with body count procedures in a senseless, immoral, unpopular, and undeclared war. All this may have resulted in the brutalization of fine young Americans.

Like many other Senators, I served in combat in World War II, but we never heard of any such thing as a body count.

Paul Meadlow, honorably discharged and returned to his home in Indiana, stated after talking with his wife and his parents he felt he must purge his mind of the horror he had participated in. His mother said:

He was a good boy when the army took him. They returned a murderer.

Sergeant Ronald Haeberle, present that morning, reported:

There was a little boy walking toward us in a daze. He'd been shot in the arm and leg. He wasn't crying or making any noise. The GI fired 3 shots into the child. The first knocked him back, the second shot lifted him into the air. The third shot put him down and the body fluids came out. The GI simply . . . walked away.

The chairman of this Senate subcommittee has alleged that there was a connection between the use of drugs and the mass killings by American troops. I know the evidence does not substantiate his suspicion or allegations. I am familiar with the facts. He is not.

Mr. President, I assert that no American involved in the My Lai massacre was under the influence of marihuana or other narcotics at the time. More important, I assert that Lieutenant General Peers or Mr. MacCrate or officials of the Department of the Army could and would have verified that fact.

Only yesterday, when the subcommittee hearings were in their final day, did officials in the Department of the Army release the facts which prove that no American involved in the My Lai massacre was under the influence of marihuana or other narcotics.

If the Peers-MacCrate report had been released to the public earlier, the harmful lies and misinformation produced in this hearing could have been avoided altogether. There is no valid excuse for keeping the facts secret any longer. All of the facts should be reported now to the American people.

Mr. President, the murders in cold blood of old men, women, children, and babies at My Lai were not the result of marihuana. They were the result of a brutalization of America's young men by prolonged participation in a dirty, senseless, immoral war.

Mr. President, it is the greatest stain on our national conscience and the greatest blunder any President ever made to send into Vietnam hundreds of thousands of U.S. fighting men—more than 2,500,000—to take over and continue the aggression of the French colonial oppressors seeking to restore the Indo-Chinese empire which ended with their defeat at Dienbienphu.

We should admit the cruelty and stupidity of our continuing aggression in Vietnam and bring all of our ground forces home in the same manner that they were sent into Vietnam—by planes and ships, and do that this year.

We must then deal with serious problems within our own country or we can expect to read of more abominations such as the one at My Lai—drugs or no drugs.

TREND TOWARD MILITARISM MUST BE STOPPED

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, the power and influence of our Military Establishment and its allies in industry has grown to the point where our Nation is on the verge of becoming a militarized society. In the words of former Marine Corps Commandant Gen. David M. Shoup:

America has become a militaristic and aggressive nation . . . Militarism in America is in full bloom and promises a future of vigorous self-pollination.

As a nation, we have become like the man so obsessed with fear of catastrophe that he spends his income on insurance against improbable events while his children go hungry and his house falls apart.

Like every American, I am concerned about the defense of our country and determined that the United States remain the strongest nation that ever existed under the bending sky of God. However, what deeply worries me and, I am sure, millions of my countrymen is the difference between legitimate defense requirements and a vast military bureaucracy exercising enormous influence on our economy, our foreign policy, and our national priorities.

The most obvious evidence of this unwarranted influence is the size of the Military Establishment. There are 3,400,000 men in our Armed Forces. The Defense Department employs 1,300,000 civilian workers. Defense contracts provide jobs for an additional 3,800,000 industrial workers. It is a fact that 50 percent of all U.S. scientists and engineers are employed by companies doing military and aerospace work. In total, the Pentagon furnishes one out of every nine jobs in the United States. The Defense Department has contracts with 22,000 prime contractors and 100,000 subcontractors. Pentagon money flows into 363 of the 435 congressional districts. Entire communities are wholly dependent on military-industrial activity for their economic life. In some sections of the country, the local economy depends entirely upon the whim of Pentagon bureaucrats.

Because the military distributes hundreds of millions of dollars to colleges and universities, it is also deeply embedded in the Nation's educational system.

Today, defense expenditures, including the cost of past wars, account for 70 cents of every dollar of Federal expenditures. This, in addition to the more than a trillion dollars spent for defense purposes since World War II.

At the same time, the Pentagon employs 339 lobbyists, or two for every three Members of Congress. By its own admission, the Defense Department is spending 27.7 million this year alone on public relations, or, in other words, in lobbying activities. The Department of Defense propaganda staff involves more than 6,000 people whose job it is to polish up the public image of the Pentagon. In the meantime, legitimate news such as the horrendous My Lai massacre is suppressed and news to our fighting men in Vietnam is censored.

Before World War II the military held an honored but not a primary role in our society and in the policymaking functions of Government. Since World War II and the advent of the cold war the rapidly increasing influence of the Military Establishment and its allies in that huge portion of the industrial establishment dedicated to huge profits from war contracts has brought forth a new element in American life. Never in our history have we had such a prolonged period of involuntary conscription. Never in our history have we devoted for such a sustained period of time such a large percentage of our gross national product on expenditures for our Armed Forces. Never in our history have the voices of the generals and admirals carried such weight in the formulation of our national and our foreign policy, and in many of the basic institutions of our society.

Slowly, imperceptibly, and unconsciously, Americans are becoming conditioned to the acceptance of regimentation, wiretapping, and snooping by large defense-related investigative agencies. Slowly, Americans are accepting as natural an invasicn of their individual privacy that their forefathers would have rebelled against. Unfortunately, security investigations, background reports, questioning of attitudes and opinions have become a part of our way of life.

Every facet of public life from politics to elementary and secondary school education to what is shown on motion picture screens is beginning more and more to be influenced by the growing power of the Pentagon. Our children are being subtly taught not to question the views of their military leaders, but to accept them as gospel. The military has been glorified on television and in motion pictures to the point where it is considered subversive by many citizens to criticize the Pentagon or the actions and statements of military leaders.

It is reasonable to assume that such a situation as we now find ourselves in was very much in the mind of President Eisenhower when, in his farewell address to the Nation in January 1961, he warned against the growing power and influence of the military-industrial complex. It is also noteworthy that George Washington, in his Farewell Address, also cautioned against excessive military power and influence. It was not conspiracy with which our first and 34th Presidents were concerned. Rather, they warned against a basic institutional danger—a military bureaucracy too powerful for the interplay of the traditional checks and balances upon which our democracy depends.

Mr. President, one of the most urgent tasks facing the Nation is to return the military to true civilian control and to reduce its influence over every aspect of American life. The architects of the Constitution—the Founding Fathers—wisely and with great foresight provided that in our Nation civil authority should always be supreme over the military. Unfortunately, since the end of World War II, we have drifted in the direction of a police state by our willingness to maintain the military as the unquestioned and spoiled darling of our national budget.

The combination of forces that has taken us this far down the road to complete militarization can still be stopped. Americans have finally begun to realize that after spending far more than a trillion dollars for national security since 1945, they have also bought a great deal of insecurity. There is hope that they will demand a breakout from the old needless arms spiral approach to national security.

One hopeful sign is the fact that the Pentagon can no longer rely on traditional congressional rubberstamping of Department of Defense requests. In 1968 the Senate spent only 2 days debating the Defense Department military authorization bill. The authorized $70,800 million was the highest single amount appropriated for the Defense Department in the history of the Republic. The Senate, almost without debate, yielded to the demands of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Last year there was a world of difference. This bill contained authorization for the deployment of the ABM system proposed by President Nixon. Then, for more than a month the bill was thoroughly debated in the Senate. The opposition to the ABM deployment was voted down by only a one-vote majority. Those of us who opposed the ABM, and appropriations that would necessarily follow as being utter waste of taxpayers' money, attempted to restore sanity between national expenditures and national goals.

Unless the seemingly relentless drive toward militarization is halted, we cannot even begin to make progress toward arms control and reduction or toward establishing healthy national priorities for solving our great social problems—racism, poverty, the decay of our cities, the disillusionment and rage of our youth, environmental pollution, the stagnation of our educational system, our shameful treatment of the mentally ill and the elderly, inflation, and a host of others. These pressurized problems may well explode and make an already largely ungovernable society chaotic. Such a catastrophe would be an open invitation to a domestic military solution—order at the point of a bayonet.

Let us pray that we shall never be faced with that alternative—an alternative that would spell the end of the American dream.

Mr. President, instead we must strive to keep our Nation secure, free, and powerful and to leave as a legacy to our children and grandchildren a country that is the last best hope for permanent peace in the world. Many of us have children; some have grandchildren. I have five young granddaughters. They and our children and grandchildren will be the guardians, keepers, and trustees of our Nation in a comparatively few years. I want all of them to have their country mighty, solvent, free and great just like we now have. Along with that, we all want to leave them as a legacy the last best hope for permanent peace in this now troubled world. What greater contribution can we make to those Americans who come after us than for them to summon up out of their heritage all the talent and ability that Almighty God gave them in an atmosphere of freedom and peace? If we do that then eye hath not witnessed nor finite mind conceived the future grandeur and glory of our country and its people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS). Under the previous order, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN) for 30 minutes.

THE SAINTS AND SINNERS OF FOREIGN AID

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, in his "State of the World" message, President Nixon said that he expected a new approach to foreign assistance to be one of his major foreign policy initiatives in the coming years.

He said:

> A new American purpose and attitude are required, if our economic assistance is to contribute to development in the new environment of the 1970's.

He has now sent to the Congress for our comments the report of his Task Force on International Development.

It does represent a new attitude.

But I do not find any candid statement of a new American purpose.

Congress still has not been presented with a sufficient reason to continue foreign aid as we know it now.

I have been a consistent supporter of our foreign aid programs, but the more I have lived with the existing legislation, the more I have come to believe a new American purpose in this area is most necessary.

Unless we can develop a more practical program we might as well give up the pretense under which we have been operating for the last few years.

The report of the Peterson Commission makes some interesting suggestions for rearranging the pieces on the bureaucratic crazy quilt in order to give a much needed lower profile to our foreign aid effort.

Most of my comments are now directed at questions left unanswered not only by the Peterson report, but by most of the other recent reviews of this subject by distinguished Americans and others with long attachment to foreign aid.

Before we can talk seriously about new institutional arrangements, we must have the new purpose that President Nixon asks for.

The Peterson Commission recommends a divorce of those foreign aid activities concerned with military assistance and counterinsurgency in the broadest sense of the term from those activities that are concerned with economic and humanitarian objectives.

The union between the saints and the sinners of foreign aid should be dissolved, it is said, to pave the way for giving the saints more money to spend.

Although this may be a laudable objective, I am not sure that divorce would have any such result.

Probably our most successful foreign aid programs were in Korea and Taiwan where there were ample roles for both saints and sinners.

But I agree that a divorce would be most desirable if it promises to achieve practical results.

The Peterson Commission should at least be commended for that recommendation.

If the State Department really wishes to control foreign policy in the foreign relations bureaucracy, it must be willing to accept such responsibilities.

At present, AID is a mechanism for diffusing responsibility.

It provides an irresistible temptation to all the chiefs of the foreign relations bureaucracy—Defense, CIA, State, and the White House itself—to play at intervention.

AID now provides the players with two kinds of levers to enhance their influence; if the arguments of the saints are not persuasive, there are always the arguments of the sinners.

Congress never intended the foreign aid agency to become an all-purpose intervention department.

The Peterson Commission may be right in asking that AID as it now functions be disbanded.

That is a debatable question.

But simply dissolving the marriage between the saints and the sinners of foreign aid is no reason why the Congress should vote a bigger foreign aid program.

There remains the vital question of a new American purpose.

On this score I find both the Peterson and the Pearson Commission reports disappointing.

A thorough reexamination is needed if only to rescue foreign aid from becoming the most boring subject of public policy today.

Take the word "development."

Ten years ago we thought we knew what it meant.

Now we know that development is simply a modern synonym for progress and as such it has become practically meaningless as a guide to policy.

The world is not divided into developed and underdeveloped nations.

Latin America, Africa, and Asia are not bound together in a mysterious condition called underdevelopment.

They are not bound together at all.

No worthy interest can be served by pretending otherwise.

It is true that Latin America, Asia, and Africa have experienced, in common, an historical encounter with Western ideas, Western economic and commercial penetration, and, usually, Western conquest.

And they are reacting to that common experience in certain similar ways.

They resent the fact that they were dominated or colonized in the past.

They are envious of the wealth and vitality of Western societies.

But it does not follow that the United States and other rich countries should pay reparations in the form of foreign aid for the historical impact they have had.

Nor does it follow that we should mount a crusade in the name of development in order to impose our ideas of progress on these countries.

Those who try to maintain the illusion that the world is divided into developed and underdeveloped nations must answer to the charge that they are investing the state of development with qualities of not just economic, but moral superiority as well.

There is much too much unconscious arrogance in this myth of the underdeveloped world, a myth which hides the vital differences that make these nations both interesting and understandable.

Latin America's culture is rooted in 16th century Spain; Asia's in a variety of infinitely complex traditional cultures dating back several millenia.

If Western man has undoubtedly disturbed the peace of tradition in these parts of the world, it does not follow that we should try to impose our priorities on government there, even in the name of progress.

All foreign aid inevitably involves just that hazard because all foreign aid as now practiced involves intervention in the internal affairs of other countries.

This is the most important reason why we need a new American purpose if we are to carry on foreign aid, and the Congress must understand that purpose.

The champions of development have compounded their difficulties by inventing an ingenious numbers game, designed to shock rich countries with the magnitude of the inequalities among nations, and at the same time to provide a basis for measuring the need for foreign aid.

This game has been played over and over again in years past until it has actually become a menace to the cause it is supposed to serve.

The foreign aid numbers game grossly exaggerates the real inequalities in welfare among nations.

It puts a premium on comparisons that heighten quite unnecessarily the envy and resentment between rich and powerful nations and poorer, weaker nations.

It creates a sense of hopelessness about the problems of the poorer nations that is certainly no service to them.

The key counter in this game is a useful economic indicator that was never intended to be used for international comparisons—the Gross National Product.

The foreign aid numbers game turns the GNP into a new weapon of "Western imperialism," as it is called in Communist countries.

We are supposed to believe that the average American lives 50 times better than the average Indian because, as far as we can calculate, our GNP is 50 times greater than India's.

An American family of four living under the official "poverty" line of $3,600 a year is by this method of analysis more than 10 times better off than the average Indian family.

By the same token, a haircut that costs $2.50 in Boston, Mass., is supposed to be 10 times better than the one a citizen of Bombay can get for a quarter.

There is something sinister in a method of measuring inequalities in welfare that is based on the notion that human services of roughly the same quality are somehow worth more in the rich countries simply because the price is higher.

Yet, this is precisely the kind of measurement that underlies virtually all professional attempts to measure the need for foreign aid and to set just targets for same.

Therefore, I am pleased that the Peterson Report decided against recommending that a certain portion of the U.S. GNP be earmarked for foreign aid.

I would not for a minute deny the dire plight of the masses in several poorer countries, squeezed by population pressure either into a life of landless laboring in the eroded countryside or into a formless, aimless mode of existence in the crowded cities.

But is it humane to so exaggerate the real inequalities between societies with such absurd measures of progress that envy replaces hope and real human services are denied because they cannot be measured for the GNP the way ours can.

Almost half of our GNP consists of many personal and professional services that embrace much of the human activity in our country.

In a poor country most human services, most human activity takes place outside the money economy and, therefore, does not show up in Western man's calculations of GNP.

Now I ask, are they for this reason alone worse off?

In our search for a new American purpose in foreign aid we might ask President McNamara of the World Bank why the international community should not formally abandon international comparisons based on per capita GNP in favor of some better measures—measures that dispel illusions rather than creating them; measures that do not add to misunderstanding, but hopefully lessen it.

If this means admitting that we do not really know what the need for foreign aid is, that is an admission we should accept with humility because it is obviously the truth.

A new American purpose in foreign aid should start by making a virtue out of what we don't know about progress, not about what we think we do know.

What we should have learned most from foreign aid is a better appreciation of our shortcomings.

The new purpose, then, should accent the courage to explore the unknown, not as the bearer of charity and certainly not as the payers of reparations, but rather as the beneficiaries of a technology that has blessed a minority of mankind but only rippled the peace of tradition of the vast majority.

The new purpose of American foreign aid should be, perhaps, a dedication to see how technology can be made as good a servant in hot climates as it has become in temperate climates—and especially a good servant of the very poor in those parts of the world, not just the handmaiden of the rich.

This new purpose should accent people-to-people assistance, not government-to-government assistance.

Our Government should show in word and deed that the American people do care about sharing their knowledge with other nations and helping to adapt that knowledge to the many problems that exist in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

But primarily it should be private Americans, not official Americans that offer their services.

If they hope to be really helpful, Americans must be willing to serve others rather than just their own Government and its special interests.

They must be invited by others, not imposed or bestowed as a result of a rich country's largess.

They must work under agreements where mutual responsibilities are set out clearly.

They should be fired if they do not live up to their part of the bargain.

Americans with the skills and motivations to give this kind of help, to undertake new voyages of technological discovery, exist in many different kinds of organizations in the United States.

They can be found in universities, in private corporations, and in a host of private associations, religious and secular.

It may be that they should not be brought into the Government because government may not provide a suitable career for them.

The Government's primary task in foreign aid should be to receive requests from others and refer them to likely contractors in the private sector and to help with the negotiation of suitable contracts.

The Government should not be in the business of implementing this kind of foreign aid.

I can imagine an institution to implement foreign aid that is wholly outside government, directed and supported by one or more foundations on an unselfish basis.

Such an institution could be financed by both public and private contributions in the measure that its services were requested, and its contracts proved useful.

I believe Congress would support generously such an institution as an alternative to the progressive bureaucratization of foreign aid.

Such an institution is needed to encourage a new generation of Americans who are willing and able to work in the hot climates of the world where so many of the world's impoverished millions live.

Such an institution could play a part in encouraging private investment.

I can see no need for a new development bank as recommended by the Peterson Task Force On International Development.

We have a sufficient number of international and regional development finance agencies now.

Insofar as their performance warrants it, we should continue to support these agencies.

But let us not forget that capital dressed up as foreign aid is simply a subsidy to the exporters in the rich countries.

We offer through the Export-Import Bank certain financial facilities for American exporters.

Perhaps they should be liberalized somewhat to accommodate some of the development lending now done by AID.

But when it comes to providing others with capital to buy things in the United States, that business should be conducted on a businesslike basis.

Borrowers come to a bank, like the Export-Import Bank, because they want to buy something in the United States.

That is purpose enough, and we do not have to dress that business up as development aid.

Here we run into that old foreign aid numbers game again.

We are told that capital, subsidized capital from the rich countries, is the first need of poor countries today.

We are not told that subsidies to exporters in the rich countries are needed, or are what so many exporters desire.

This seems to me to be a dangerous game, pretty much like a con game in which only the dealer can win.

To falsify the real price of capital in a poor country is not progress or development.

It is simply inhumane treatment.

It could mean sentencing millions to misery if the capital thus provided deprived more people of a livelihood than it employed by exhausting their resources and limiting their income.

After all, poor countries have in the main one natural advantage in the competition among nations and that is a potentially vast pool of labor.

If foreign aid does not build on that advantage, it cannot be called humane.

We need a new American purpose in foreign aid because we are an activist people and because real inequalities in welfare among societies today affront our sense of justice.

But injustices cannot be expressed in terms of Gross National Product, nor can they be overcome by falsifying the function of capital in society.

No manipulation of foreign aid funds, no benevolent banker of poor countries, can buy us out of what is a historical predicament that promises to be with us for generations.

The real opportunity of the rich countries is not to offer subsidized capital but to see their own economies in global terms.

They must create more and more room in the world market for the production of the poorer countries simply to insure expanding opportunities for themselves.

More than anything else this means expanding the purchasing power of the people of the less affluent nations.

This is particularly important now that we live in a state of more or less permanent inflation because there is so much to do here at home.

Without more and more sources of production in the world markets, without the discipline of international competition, costs and prices in the rich countries will become even more absurdly unrelated to real human welfare than they are now.

When a haircut comes to cost $10 in Washington or Paris or Tokyo, it is not going to be forty times better than a haircut that still costs a quarter in Bombay.

There is so much hypocrisy in the rich countries' attitude toward foreign aid.

To subsidize exports in the name of foreign aid, while at the same time barring imports from the very countries to which the aid is flowing, is not a new purpose—it is a very old hypocrisy.

If the rich countries really care about the plights of the poor, they will accept President Nixon's challenge to institute a system of global trade preferences designed to assure poor countries the right to compete in the world market with their new production.

We should also try to enter into agreements so that the rich countries do not use poorer countries as pawns in the international trade wars.

After all, the most serious and damaging effect on our own economy comes not from the poorer countries but from the most prosperous nations.

I said I was in favor of divorcing the saints and the sinners of foreign aid in order to reduce the temptation that the present marriage provides for all those who want to play at intervention.

But obviously it is not always easy to tell the saints from the sinners in this business.

To search for a new purpose is much more difficult than the proponents of foreign aid would have us believe.

Perhaps if we abandon the numbers game, perhaps if we stop talking about vague concepts like development and start concentrating on the real possibilities of making technology the servant of the very poor who crowd the hot climates of the world, perhaps if the rich countries really begin to see their economies in global terms—perhaps only then will a new purpose emerge.

All of us are hoping that the President will give us a new direction, for not to do so would be to admit to a failure on our part.

Foreign policy must appeal to something more than very narrow notions of national interest if it is to enjoy sustained public support in this country.

Foreign aid used to suggest such a dimension.

At the same time a nation that can only express such purposes in terms of dollars is a nation in search, not of a new purpose, but merely of a sop to its conscience or a gratification to its desires.

Foreign aid is not worth it as a sop to our conscience for we will probably do more harm than good with it.

To sum up my remarks on foreign aid programs, I have these recommendations to make:

First. Do not use aid as an excuse for intervention in the affairs of smaller, poorer countries;

Second. Stop using the Gross National Product as a yardstick for comparing rich and poor countries;

Third. Use international banks for the business for which banks are intended, not for imposing our moral or political beliefs on the needy people of poorer countries;

Fourth. Recognize the fact that much of our aid programs over the past 10 years have simply made rich countries richer and poorer countries more discouraged.

In the absence of a new American purpose, perhaps it would be better to close the books on the past two decades of American foreign aid programs and leave the work to international agencies with such support from us as their performance warrants.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I was delighted to receive a copy of the Senator's speech before he gave it. I have not given it as much detailed study as I would like, but I do appreciate the accent which he stresses, the emphasis which the Senator places upon people-to-people assistance rather than government-to-government assistance. The latter, I think, by and large, has been in all too many instances a complete failure.

The summing up of recommendations which the distinguished Senator would make for carrying out the foreign aid program meets with my approval. I think he has exposed some methods which have surrounded this program for too long. This idea of using the gross national product as a measure of what it means or does not mean—anyone can twist that as he sees fit. The suggestion that there should be more internationalization, certainly, I think is worth a great deal; and most important, the Senator's No. 1 recommendation, "Do not use aid as an excuse for intervention in the affairs of smaller, poorer, countries," I believe is most sound.

I commend the distinguished Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of our majority leader, and would tell him that I would have given him an advance copy of these remarks sooner, except that they were finished only about a half hour before I started delivering them.

Mr. MANSFIELD. May I say that in that respect the distinguished Senator reminds me many times of Adlai Stevenson, who was never able to get his talks down on paper until just before he started to speak. But I am delighted to to have this copy.

Mr. AIKEN. Sometimes all of us slow down and have to be pushed up against a deadline before we can get to work.

But I particularly wanted to point out the travesty of using the gross national product in comparing the welfare of people in poor countries with the welfare of people in rich countries.

The gross national product is all right as a means of comparing ourselves with Japan or Western Europe; but when it comes to comparing our situation, our welfare, with that of people who live in some of the very poor tropical countries, the use of GNP for this purpose is simply a farce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) is recognized for 10 minutes.

ERA OF NEGOTIATION?—PART I

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, this morning, representatives of the United States, Saigon, Hanoi, and the Vietcong met for the 60th session of the Paris Vietnam peace talks. Nothing was accomplished, just as nothing has been accomplished on the negotiating front at any of the other Paris sessions since Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge resigned his post, 126 days ago.

While the charade of talks goes on, the war continues in Vietnam and threatens to spread in other parts of Southeast Asia. Laos is a battleground and Cambodia is in turmoil. We teeter on the edge of a wider war without a semblance of an effort to negotiate a peace settlement in that troubled part of the world.

A negotiated settlement is the only answer that makes sense in Southeast Asia, for those who live there and for the United States. A military solution is not viable for Vietnam, and it cannot bring peace in other countries of that region.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the administration does not seem to be committed to a negotiated settlement. While it pursues the goal of false optimism with Vietnamization, the war goes on, casualties are up, and the dangers to world peace escalate. We are now told that the most the administration is planning, and the best it can achieve under Vietnamization is to have 225,000 troops left in Vietnam at the end of 1971—21 months from now.

This is a matter of grave concern to me and to other Members of the Senate. It is a matter which cannot be brushed aside by vague assurances and an attitude of wait and see.

I believe the time has come for the administration to turn its attention to a genuine effort toward a negotiated settlement, or to tell the American people why they have written off negotiations as the best way to end the fighting and the killing in Vietnam. For these reasons, Mr. President, I intend to raise the question about a negotiated end to the war in Vietnam each week in the Senate, until a successor to Mr. Lodge has been named and until some meaningful steps have been taken toward a settlement in Paris.

INCREASING DOUBTS

Each week more questions are being raised about the wisdom of the administration's policies and the directions in which they are leading us. A common thread unites the critics. The tragic conflict in Vietnam will know no satisfactory conclusion other than by negotiation.

As Gen. Matthew B. Ridgeway wrote in the New York Times, March 14, 1970:

> Many continue to argue that a military solution, or 'victory', in Vietnam has all along been within our reach, that nothing less would serve our interests. I believe such a solution is not now and never has been possible under conditions consistent with our interests. . . .
> A negotiated settlement, which I think we would all prefer, and which I believe we must ultimately reach, will be unattainable unless we retain the initiative and face up to these problems now.
> Regardless of how much this may tax the wisdom and determination of our Government and the patience of our people, our decision is, I believe, the prudent one, and we should channel its execution into the mainstream of our long-range national interests.

Arthur M. Cox, in an article in the "Outlook" section of the March 22, 1970, Washington Post, noted the inconsistency in President Nixon's policies, when he wrote:

> The President says Vietnamization is a plan "which will bring the war to an end regardless of what happens on the negotiating front." That is an impossibility which has been allowed to go unchallenged. The war will end only when one side wins a military victory or when a settlement has been negotiated. Since Vietnamization rules out serious negotiation, the only conceivable other assumption must be that the President is counting on the South Vietnamese to win their own war.

Commenting on recent events in Laos and Cambodia, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of March 22, 1970, noted in an editorial:

> The coup in Cambodia and Communist military success in Laos reemphasize what has been clear ever since the Geneva Conference of 1954—that peace in the whole Indochina peninsula depends on making peace in Vietnam.
> If the Nixon administration had the wit to recognize this, it would forget about Vietnamizing the war and set about negotiating a Vietnam settlement, which in turn would make possible peace in both Cambodia and Laos. Unfortunately and tragically, the administration appears to be bent on moving in precisely the opposite direction—toward expansion of the war in Laos and Cambodia as a means of supporting the policy of Vietnamization. If this is an accurate estimate of its course, then the Nation is being condemned to more and more years of war in Asia after being solemnly promised an end to it.

CONFRONTATIONS VERSUS NEGOTIATIONS

Fourteen months ago, President Nixon declared in his inaugural address that the United States would, under his administration, forsake "the era of confrontation" for "an era of negotiation" in international relations. His intentions were applauded.

On our most vexing international relations problem, ending the Vietnam war, the longest war in our history, the President said later that his administration was "proceeding in our pursuit for peace on two fronts—a peace settlement through negotiations, or if that fails, ending the war through Vietnamization."

How do those words square with the administration's failure to name a high-level replacement for Ambassador Lodge as our chief negotiator at the Paris Vietnam peace talks for more than 4 months of the 14 months of the new Nixon "era of negotiation"?

Mr. President, the administration's declarations on trying to end the war in Vietnam through negotiations are in conflict with its record of performance.

Let me focus today on just one aspect of the problem—the impact of the 4-month vacancy in the office of the top U.S. negotiator in Paris.

Our interim representative in Paris, Philip Habib, is an able career Foreign Service officer. He probably knows as much or more about Vietnam than any public servant now working for the Government. But he has not had prior ambassadorial rank. He is not a confidant of the President. He does not have the prestige needed to deal with the Communists, to explore proposals they may make, or to take initiatives on our behalf. He is at a hopeless disadvantage in his assignment.

Mr. Habib was the No. 3 man on the U.S. delegation, first under Ambassadors Harriman and Vance, and then under Ambassadors Lodge and Walsh. The North Vietnamese and Vietcong delegates have made it clear, time and again, that their top people will not engage in major discussions with representatives from our side who in their view, lack top credentials.

They made this clear in the past as well as in the present. When Averell Harriman was not present, his able deputy, Cyrus Vance, was never able to meet with their top man. I believe the same situation prevailed during Ambassador Lodge's tenure. Since Ambassador Lodge resigned, the Communists have not once sent their chief negotiators to the talks, and they have told us publicly and privately that they will not engage in serious talks with Mr. Habib.

This may seem a mere matter of protocol to some, but I believe it amounts to shortchanging the negotiations on the part of the Nixon administration. Obviously, North Vietnam, a country of fewer than 20 million people, is going to be acutely conscious of such matters in dealing with the United States, one of the world's two superpowers, with more than 10 times its population.

This is, moreover, an unfortunate and foolish time to be disadvantaged by the level of our representation in Paris. Le Duc Tho, a member of Hanoi's politburo and acknowledged as one of the top 10 in the North Vietnamese power structure, returned to Paris recently after an absence of many months. But we have been unable to engage in any discussions with him because he will not do business with anyone Hanoi considers of lesser rank.

This imbalance is accentuated by the representatives of the two South Vietnamese parties. The Vietcong representative, Madame Binh, holds the rank of "foreign minister of the provisional revolutionary government." Since General Ky left Paris early last year, the Government of South Vietnam has been represented by Ambassador Lam, who now frequently fails to appear and sends a deputy to the weekly meetings. Apparently he wants to strike a pose of equality with the second-rank representation of the Communists.

This is a problem we have caused by our failure to replace Ambassador Lodge with a representative of equal rank. Even when Lam has been present at the sessions, he has been a negotiator of limited means, who has to obtain authority for virtually every move, no matter how minor, from his superiors in Saigon.

QUESTIONS NEEDING ANSWERS

Mr. President, what is the administration trying to convey by this unfortunate diplomatic-protocol gap in Paris?

Is it so pleased with the progress and future of Vietnamization that it feels that the whole conflict can be settled to our satisfaction by force? Or does it feel that the reduced but still enormous U.S. troop presence in the south is inadequate to let us speak effectively to Hanoi or Saigon, to get them to resolve their differences by negotiation?

What has the administration done to get Saigon to send to Paris a representative both able and willing to negotiate?

How does the administration propose to deal with the related instability and conflict in Laos and Cambodia?

Is the administration so certain, in the face of some contrary evidence, that Hanoi's position in Paris is one of total intransigence? Even if the administration is so convinced, does this mean it has no obligation to probe and to try? Does it believe the tough bargaining necessary to achieve a negotiated end to the war is not worth the time of a top-level appointment as our chief negotiator in Paris?

Has the administration written off negotiations? If not, what are its preconditions for resuming meaningful negotiations? Is it, in effect, asking North Vietnam to surrender?

Is the administration playing a game where the next move can be made only by the other side?

Have we given up the initiative toward peace to the other side?

I raise these questions, Mr. President, because they must be answered if we are to know what the administration's real intentions are with respect to Vietnam and the rest of Southeast Asia. We have been told that the administration has a plan for peace in Vietnam, but the hard questions remain.

I believe the American people have a right to get some answers to those questions, and I intend to raise them each week until they are answered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. MUSKIE. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the statement of the distinguished Senator from Maine. I am sure he does not intend to leave the impression or suggestion that the North Vietnamese have been negotiating or seeking to negotiate in good faith in Paris; or does he believe that is the case?

Mr. MUSKIE. I understand the questions I have asked leave impressions. The questions were very carefully asked.

These impressions would not exist if we were to get tangible reassurance from the administration that it considers the negotiations, though difficult, important to our national interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes so that I may respond to the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUSKIE. We have learned from our experience of over a quarter of a century that negotiating with the Communists can be a time-consuming, drawn out, and frustrating experience, we learned that during the negotiations following Korea; we learned that from our experience in Berlin.

The question is whether or not, notwithstanding these difficulties and frustrations, we regard this process, however difficult, as significant and important to our interests.

The question raised by the Senator's question is whether or not the administration—which he is in a better position to represent than I—has decided that the next initiative in Paris will be taken only by the other side and not by us.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a brief observation?

Mr. MUSKIE. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Of course, I cannot let the record stand without noting that for many months the distinguished and very able former ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Lodge, represented us in Paris; that every effort was made and has been made throughout many long, long months of negotiating to reach some kind of agreement with the Communists at the negotiation table in Paris; and I also would dispute any suggestion that his successor who now represents the United States in Paris is not most able, most capable, most distinguished, and most qualified to represent this Nation at Paris.

Further, I wish to remind the Senator and note for the RECORD that the United States at all times has been willing and eager to consider any good-faith offer or serious suggestion which the North Vietnamese might put forth at any time. That has been true, it continues to be true, and it will continue to be true.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. MUSKIE. Whatever any of us say on this subject leaves impressions. The impressions I get from the Senator's comments are: First, because of the frustrations Ambassador Lodge faced prior to his resignation, we decided not to seriously pursue negotiations in Paris, and second, as a result of that experience, if any initiative is taken in Paris, it will have to be taken by the other side. I hope those impressions are erroneous. I raised questions in my prepared remarks which, if answered, would correct those impressions.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION CONCERNING ILLEGAL USE, TRANSPORTATION, OR POSSESSION OF EXPLOSIVES

A letter from the Attorney General of the United States, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend section 837 of Title 18, United States Code, to strengthen the laws concerning illegal use, transportation, or possession of explosives and the penalties with respect thereto, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITION

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SPONG) laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 14

Requesting congressional action on the repeal of the Emergency Detention Act of 1950

Whereas, Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950, otherwise known as the Emergency Detention Act of 1950, provides that upon declaration by the President of the United States of a state of "internal security emergency," the President through the United States Attorney General, may apprehend and by order detain any person as to whom there is reasonable ground to believe that such person probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to engage in, acts of sabotage or espionage; and

Whereas, Title II does not provide for a trial by jury or even before a judge, nor does it provide appeal to the courts, such civil rights and liberties being guaranteed under the United States Constitution, substituting instead the judgment of the Preliminary Hearing Officer appointed by the Attorney General and a Detention Review Board composed of members appointed de facto and paid by the Attorney General, the very official who initiates the proceedings for the apprehension and detention of the suspect; and

Whereas, this country has already experienced the tragic and regrettable consequences of the unnecessary and unwarranted internment of over 100,000 Americans of Japanese ancestry in detention camps during World War II without due process of law; and

Whereas, the Emergency Detention Act of 1950 was the product of another era when cold war tensions were at a fever pitch and when Communist subversion was the great national fear, however, in the last two decades our socio-political climate has changed greatly and other more meaningful, just, and effective laws and procedures to safeguard internal security could be used; and

Whereas, it is now imperative to eliminate a meaningless provision that has been used to generate equally meaningless fears among minority groups, and to remove the specter of concentration camps which remains in America as long as such a provision remains law; and

Whereas, approximately nine bills have been introduced in the 91st Congress thus far calling for the repeal of Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950 largely through the combined efforts of Senator Daniel K. Inouye and Representative Spark M. Matsunaga and which have been co-sponsored by an unprecedented one-fourth of the membership of the Congress; now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1970, the Senate concurring, that the President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, United States Senator Hiram L. Fong, United States Senator Daniel K. Inouye, United States Representative Spark M. Matsunaga, United States Representative Patsy T. Mink, and the chairmen of the respective congressional committees considering those bills calling for the repeal of Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950, be, and hereby are, requested to take whatever action is necessary, including the holding of and participation at public hearings on the subject, to ensure the repeal of Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950; and

Be it further resolved that duly certified copies of this Concurrent Resolution be transmitted to Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States; to Spiro T. Agnew, Vice-President of the United States; to John W. McCormack, Speaker of the United States House of Representatives; to each member of Hawaii's delegation to the United States Congress; and to the chairmen of the respective congressional committees which will be or presently are considering those bills calling for the repeal of Title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SPONG) announced that on today, March 26, 1970, he signed the enrolled bill (S. 2593) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to facilitate the entry of certain nonimmigrants into the United States, and for other purposes, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

S. 3642—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PROVIDE FOR THE ADDITION OF CERTAIN PROPERTY TO HAWAII VOLCANOES NATIONAL PARK, HAWAII

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the addition of certain property to the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park in the State of Hawaii.

This measure would authorize the National Park Service to acquire for enlargement of the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park not more than 198,000 acres of lands by donation, or by purchase with donated or appropriated funds or by exchange. Presently the park acreage is approximately 201,007 acres of land.

With this acquisition we would preserve for posterity one of the most picturesque and wild areas in the Hawaiian Islands. As it is hoped that most of the land will be donated, the cost of enlarging the park will be minimal.

Hawaii Volcanoes National Park is situated on the gentle slopes of the volcano Mauna Loa. On this acreage is to be found the spectacular volcano crater Kilauea which continues to erupt and to provide to tourists and natives unrivaled shows of nature.

The landscape itself includes the lush growth one would expect in a semitropical climate. Many native Hawaiian trees such as the Koa and the Ohia with its bright red flowers, flourish in the park. Then, too, there are miles of sparse and desolate aa and pahoehoe lava spewed up by both recent and not-so-recent lava flows.

All of this contrasting landscape composes a beautiful and picturesque national park.

This park area has also been the site of scientific experiments. The National Aeronautical and Space Administration brought a group of astronauts to the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park to walk over the lava fields as mental preparation for the landing on the moon. The atmosphere at the high ranges of the park is ideally clear and is used as the site for astronomical observatories.

To the northwest of the present park site is Hualalai, a mountain that rises to its peak from the oceanside town of Kailua-Kona. In the Hualalai area are crevices where the earth has caved inwards. There are mounds of red and black cinders dotted with sparse vegetation. The summit of Hualalai is marked with cones and craters of past volcanic eruptions. On the slopes of Hualalai graze wild goats and pigs as well as wild turkeys and the nene, a kind of goose which is unique to Hawaii and is the official State bird.

The bill I am introducing today would extend the present boundaries of the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park to include Hualalai Mountain and the area between the park and this picturesque but lonely peak.

It would also authorize the National Park Service to acquire additional lands adjacent to the City of Refuge National Historical Park area situated at Honaunau at the base of Hualalai.

Honaunau has been restored to something of its original state when it was an ancient Hawaiian city of refuge. It was the law that any fugitive who reached Honaunau was to be free from persecution while he remained there.

The City of Refuge itself is part of the National Park Service system. The land adjacent to Honaunau is partially under private ownership and partially under trust control. Some of the private owners and trusts have expressed a desire to have some of that land deeded over to the National Park Service in order to preserve it as part of the historical park.

The bill authorizes the Secretary to acquire not more than 710 acres as an addition to the City of Refuge National Historical Park, by donation, purchase or exchange. Whatever State lands are acquired for these parks would be by donation.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to designate a right-of-way, together with related sites for the purpose of developing a Hawaii parkway joining the Hualalai area with the present Hawaii Volcanoes National Park and the City of Refuge National Historical Park with the Hualalai area.

I am convinced that the acquisition of these lands are essential to the preservation of this critical part of Hawaii's ecological history. These land areas provide an outdoor classroom for not only Hawaii's citizens but all of the people of our great country and those who visit Hawaii from foreign countries. Here they can see first-hand the creation and metamorphosis of once molten lava into habitable lands.

It may be that refinements will have to be made in certain details of this measure which I am introducing today. However, it does provide a starting point for consideration by the Congress and I urge the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the committee to which this bill is being referred, to take action on it as soon as possible.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SPONG). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3642) to provide for the addition of certain property to Hawaii Volcanoes National Park in the State of Hawaii, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. FONG, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. 3644—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO EXTEND TRAVEL FARE CONCESSIONS TO BLIND AIRLINE PASSENGERS WHO ARE ACCOMPANIED BY SIGHTED GUIDES

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to permit the Nation's airlines to extend travel fare concessions to blind passengers who are accompanied by sighted guides. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

Mr. President, this is permissive legislation only, to permit that the same type of fare concessions may be granted to the blind by the airlines as are currently granted by the railroads and buslines. Travel fare concessions have been authorized and have worked successfully on buses and trains in the United States for more than 30 years and are permitted on airplanes in several European countries.

This legislation would not require any airline to grant fare concessions to the blind. Neither would it establish what type of fare concessions might be granted.

The fare concession granted most often by the buslines permits free travel for a sighted attendant when the blind passenger pays full fare.

The most common railroad fare concession allows the sighted attendant to travel free when the blind passenger pays first-class fare.

The American Council of the Blind has discussed fare concessions with a number of the airlines and receive assurances that the airlines would be favorably disposed to grant fare concessions if the Federal Aviation Act were amended to permit them to do so.

It is the policy of this Government to encourage the fullest possible participation in all aspects of life by any handicapped individual. Our legislative programs for special education, research, and vocational training programs for the handicapped testify to our concern that all Americans enjoy to the fullest the benefits of life in this country. Favorable action on this bill will make it economically more feasible for the blind to explore and expand their world of opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3644) to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 in order to authorize free or reduced rate transportation for blind persons and persons in attendance, when the blind person is traveling with such an attendant, introduced by Mr. SMITH of Illinois, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3644

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 403(b) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 is amended by inserting after "persons in connection with such accident;" the following: "blind persons and persons with sight attending such blind persons, when the blind person is traveling with such a person in attendance;".

S. 3645—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO AUTHORIZE FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR THE ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN RAIL-HIGHWAY GRADE CROSSINGS IN THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize Federal assistance for the elimination of certain rail-highway grade crossings in the State of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

Mr. President, the State of Illinois and the Chicago area specifically form one of the major links in our national rail system. The marketplaces of the world are served by the rail centers of Illinois.

Each ground-level, rail-highway crossings in the great rail network of Illinois is a potential safety hazard where the slightest mishap can tie up and delay the delivery of goods and the mail throughout the Nation. The elimination of these ground-level crossings will facilitate the service of the Nation's railroads to the Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3645) to authorize appropriations to be used for the elimination of certain rail-highway grade crossings in the State of Illinois, introduced by Mr. SMITH of Illinois, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3645

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to pay the cost of each project to eliminate a ground-level, rail-highway crossing on those railroad routes in the State of Illinois, used in connection with the rail transportation of freight or passenger traffic. Each project to eliminate such a crossing shall be subject to section 130 of title 23, United States Code, in the same manner and to the same extent as any other project subject to such section, except that the entire Federal cost of a project for which payment is authorized by this Act shall be paid out of sums appropriated to carry out this Act and not from amounts apportioned to a State in accordance with section 104 of title 23, United States Code. Payments under this Act shall be made by the Secretary of Transportation to the State of Illinois in accordance with such rules and regulations as he deems necessary to protect the interests of the United States.

S. 3650—INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO STRENGTHEN FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS CONCERNING ILLEGAL USE, TRANSPORTATION AND POSSESSION OF EXPLOSIVES

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I introduce a bill which is designed to strengthen the Federal criminal laws concerning the illegal use, transportation, and possession of explosives. I am introducing this bill at the request of the Attorney General and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The country is being subjected to a rising tide of terrorism. In Washington, D.C., the Nation's Capital, on one day earlier this month, there were 28 bomb threats. On the same day in New York City, there were 161 bomb threats. That same night, a building in Buffalo, N.Y., was seriously damaged by an explosion.

During the last 3 months, more than a score of bombs have exploded in more than a dozen different cities, killing at least six persons and injuring at least 15. The property damage has run well into the millions of dollars. This terrorism must be stopped.

The bill modifies existing law, as found in 18 U.S.C. 837, in several respects. First, a new subsection is added to cover malicious damage to Federal property, when that damage is caused by explosives. Another subsection is included to cover malicious damage to real and personal property used for business purposes by persons engaged in "commerce." Other modifications are made to the penalty sections.

The bill submitted by the administration is designed to carry out the commitment made by the President of the United States to deal with this recent rash of bombings.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the statement of the President, the letter of transmittal from the Attorney General to the Vice President, be printed in the RECORD along with the bill and a section-by-section analysis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, statement of the President, the letter of transmittal and the section-by-section analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3650) to amend section 837 of title 18, United States Code, to strengthen the laws concerning illegal use, transportation, or possession of explosives and the penalties with respect thereto, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HRUSKA, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Section 837 of Title 18, United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"(a) As used in this section—

"'commerce' means commerce between any State, the District of Columbia, or any Commonwealth, Territory or possession of the United States, and any place outside thereof; or between points within the same State, the District of Columbia, or any Commonwealth, Territory or possession of the United States but through any place outside thereof; or within the District of Columbia, or any Territory or possession of the United States;

"'explosive' means gunpowder, powder used for blasting, all forms of high explosives, blasting materials, fuzes (other than electric circuit breakers), detonators, and other detonating agents, smokeless powders, other explosive or incendiary devices within the meaning of paragraph (5) of section 232 of this title, and any chemical compounds, mechanical mixture, or device that contains any oxidizing and combustible units, or other ingredients, in such proportions, quantities, or packing that ignition by fire, by friction, by concussion, by percussion, or by detonation of the compound, mixture, or device or any part thereof may cause an explosion.

"(b) Whoever transports or receives, or attempts to transport or receive, in commerce any explosive with the knowledge or intent that it will be used to kill, injure, or intimidate any individual or unlawfully to damage or destroy any building, vehicle, or other real or personal property, shall be imprisoned for not more than ten years, or fined not more than $10,000, or both; and if personal injury results shall be imprisoned for not more than twenty years or fined not more than $20,000, or both; and if death results shall be subject to imprisonment for any term of years, or to the death penalty or to life imprisonment as provided in section 34 of this title.

"(c) Whoever, through the use of the mail, telephone, telegraph, or other instrument of commerce, willfully makes any threat, or maliciously conveys false information knowing the same to be false, concerning an attempt or alleged attempt being made, or to be made, to kill, injure, or intimidate any individual or unlawfully to damage or destroy any building, vehicle, or other real or personal property by means of an explosive shall be imprisoned for not more than five years or fined not more than $5,000, or both.

"(d) Whoever maliciously damages or destroys, or attempts to damage or destroy, by means of an explosive, any building, vehicle or other personal or real property in whole or in part owned, possessed, or used by, or leased to, the United States or any department or agency thereof, shall be imprisoned for not more than ten years, or fined not more than $10,000, or both; and if personal injury results shall be imprisoned for not more than twenty years, or fined not more than $20,000, or both; and if death results shall also be subject to imprisonment for any term of years, or to the death penalty or to life imprisonment as provided in section 34 of this title.

"(e) Whoever possesses an explosive in any building in whole or in part owned, possessed, or used by, or leased to, the United States or any department or agency thereof, except with the written consent of the agency, department or other person responsible for the management of such building shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or fined not more than $1,000, or both.

"(f) Whoever maliciously damages or destroys, or attempts to damage or destroy, by means of an explosive, any building, vehicle, or other real or personal property used for business purposes by a person engaged in commerce or in any activity affecting commerce shall be imprisoned for not more than ten years or fined not more than $10,000, or both; and if personal injury results shall be imprisoned for not more than twenty years or fined not more than $20,000, or both; and if death results shall also be subject to imprisonment for any term of years, or to the death penalty or to life imprisonment as provided in section 34 of this title.

"(g) Whoever possesses an explosive with the knowledge or intent that such explosive will be transported or used in violation of this section shall be imprisoned for not more five years or fined not more than $5,000, or both.

"(h) Nothing in this section should be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress to prevent any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or the District of Columbia, from exercising jurisdiction over any offense over which it would have jurisdiction in the absence of this section, nor shall anything in this section be construed as depriving State and local law enforcement authorities of responsibility for investigating and prosecuting actions that may be violations of this section and that are violations of State and local law.

"(i) No investigation or prosecution of any offense described in this section shall be undertaken by the United States except upon a determination by the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General designated by the Attorney General, that in his judgment an investigation or prosecution by the United States is in the public interest."

SEC. 2. The reference to section 837 in the analysis of Chapter 39, Title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"837. Explosives—illegal transportation, use or possession; threats or false information."

The material, presented by Mr. HRUSKA, is as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

Recent months have brought an alarming increase in the number of criminal bombings in the cities of our country. In recent weeks, the situation has become particularly acute, as telephoned threats and actual bombings have sent fear through many American communities.

Schools and public buildings have had to be evacuated; considerable property has been destroyed; lives have been lost. Clearly, many of these bombings have been the work of political fanatics, many of them young criminals posturing as romantic revolutionaries. They must be dealt with as the potential murderers they are.

Under existing law, the transport of explosives across the State lines is, under some circumstances, a Federal crime. I am proposing an extensive strengthening and expansion of that law. In the proposals being sent to the Congress, it is asked that:

Anyone involved in the transport or receipt in commerce of explosives, intending their unlawful use, be made subject to imprisonment for ten years or a fine of $10,000 or both. The current maximum penalty is a single year in prison or a thousand dollar fine or both.

The maximum penalty be doubled to twenty years in prison or a twenty thousand dollar fine or both if anyone is injured as the ultimate result of such transport of explosives.

Penalties for bomb threats be raised from one year in prison to a maximum of five years or five thousand dollars fine or both.

Incendiary devices be included in the category of "explosives," bringing such devices under the anti-bombing provisions.

Use of explosives to damage or destroy any building, vehicle or other property owned or leased to the Federal government be made a Federal crime.

Possession, without written authorization, of any explosive in such a building be made a Federal crime.

Use of explosive to damage or destroy any building or property used for business purposes by any person or firm engaged in interstate commerce, or in any activity affecting such commerce, be made a Federal crime.

Possession of explosives with the intent to damage either Federal property or property used in its business by a person engaged in interstate commerce also be made a Federal crime.

The individual engaged in the transport or use of explosives in violation of these provisions be made subject to the death penalty if a fatality occurs.

Our purpose in bringing these crimes under Federal jurisdiction is not to displace State or local authority. Federal investigations and prosecutions would begin only after the Attorney General had determined that intervention by the national government is necessary in the public interest. Our purpose is rather to assist State and local governments in their efforts to combat the multiplying number of acts of urban terror. I am also asking that Law Enforcement Assistance Administration funds be specifically designated for special training programs for State and local law enforcement agencies to aid them in coping with this latest threat to the public safety and to the maintenance of a free and open society.

The anarchic and criminal elements who perpetrate such acts deserve no more patience or indulgence. It is time to deal with them for what they are.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: There is enclosed for your consideration and appropriate reference a legislative proposal "To amend Section 837 of Title 18, United States Code, to strengthen the laws concerning illegal use, transportation, or possession of explosives and the penalties with respect thereto, and for other purposes."

This proposed legislation is designed to assist in the carrying out of the President's commitment to deal with the recent series of bomb explosions and bombing threats. It would revise 18 U.S.C. 837 to expand its scope, improve its effectiveness, and increase its penalties in several significant respects. The potential large loss of life, the destruction of property, and the disruption of the daily activities of our people, our economy and our government all require that we act promptly.

First, the definition of explosives in subsection (a) has been expanded, chiefly by including the definition of explosive and incendiary device in section 232 of the same title, which section more specifically covers devices such as "Molotov cocktails".

Second, subsection (b) of section 837, which now deals with the offense of transporting an explosive with the knowledge or intent that it will be used in cretain wrongful ways, has been substantially broadened both as to the overt conduct covered and as to the range of known or intended wrongful uses that are specified. The present basic penalties of up to a year's imprisonment or a fine of up to $1,000 or both, have been increased to up to ten years or $10,000, or both. These would be doubled if personal injury resulted, with additional imprisonment for up to a life term or the death penalty if death resulted.

Third, subsection (c), dealing with willfully conveying threats or information known to be false (now covered by subsection (d)), has been revised with respect to the subject matter and character of the threats or false information to relate more directly and effectively to bombing threats and malicious bombing scares. The maximum penalties have been increased from a year's imprisonment and a $1,000 fine, to five years and a $5,000 fine.

Fourth, a new subsection (d) is proposed to cover malicious damage or destruction by explosives of federal premises and other federal property. The range of penalties in this subsection, ranging up to the death penalty if death results, is the same as that proposed for subsection (b).

Fifth, a new subsection (e), with lesser penalties, covers unauthorized possession of explosives in federal buildings, including buildings used by or leased in whole or in part to federal agencies.

Sixth, a new subsection (f) covers malicious damage or destruction of real or personal property used for business purposes by persons or firms engaged in commerce or activities affecting commerce. The range of penalties is the same as in subsection (b) and (d).

Seventh, a new subsection (g) covers possession of explosives with the knowledge or intent that they will be transported or used to violate the section. Penalties of up to five years imprisonment, a $5000 fine, or both, are prescribed.

Eighth, present subsection (e) of the section, dealing with the effect of the section on State laws, has been revised as subsection (h) to emphasize State law enforcement responsibility.

Finally, since the Federal Government cannot possibly have the manpower and facilities to become involved in every bomb threat or bombing incident, and because the investigation and prosecution of most such incidents are State and local responsibilities, a new subsection (i) has been added to make certain that federal action under the section will not be undertaken except upon high level authorization in each case.

A section-by-section analysis of the proposal is enclosed and further explains its provisions.

This legislation will, in the view of this Department, provide legal tools of substantial value in dealing with the unfortunate and continuing rash of bombings and bomb threats. The Bureau of the Budget has advised that its enactment would be in accord with the Program of the President.

Sincerely,

———— ————,
Attorney General.

ANALYSIS OF LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL TO AMEND 18 U.S.C. 837, RELATING TO EXPLOSIVES

Section 1 of the measure amends section 837 of title 18, United States Code, recasting it in nine subsections. The changes are as follows:

1. Subsection (a) expands the definition of "explosive" in present subsection (a), primarily to include explosive or incendiary devices as defined in 18 U.S.C. 232. Technical revisions are also made in the definition of "commerce."

2. Subsection (b) presently makes it a crime to transport explosives in interstate commerce with the knowledge or intent that they will be used to damage or destroy property for the purpose of interfering with its use for specific objectives or for the purpose of intimidating any person pursuing such objectives. The bill would amend subsection (b) to include receipt as well as transportation; apply to attempts; cover movement in "commerce" rather than "interstate commerce" so as to embrace movement wholly within areas, such as the District of Columbia, which are subject to plenary federal jurisdiction, and clearly to embrace movement originating and terminating within one jurisdiction but through another one; abolish the test of specific forbidden purposes in favor of a general requirement of knowledge or intent that the explosives would be used in substantially any crime of violence; and increase the applicable penalties. Two technical amendments to subsection (b) are also made. The provision for imposing the death penalty is revised to comply with the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Jackson, 390 U.S. 570 (1968), and the present reference in subsection (b) to aiding and abetting is deleted as unnecessary (see 18 U.S.C. 2).

3. Present subsection (c) is deleted. This subsection creates a rebuttable presumption that a person who uses an explosive for certain destructive purposes or who possesses an explosive with intent so to use it has violated subsection (b). This presumption is of dubious validity (see Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463 (1943), Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6 (1969)). This coupled with the ambiguous proviso at the end of the subsection has prompted its deletion.

4. Subsection (c) is a substantially revised subsection (d) of existing law, which deals with bomb threats and hoaxes. Changes are made to conform to the broadened coverage of subsection (b). The requirement of showing the specific purpose of the threat has been deleted and replaced with the more general requirement that the threat must be willful or the false information must be communicated maliciously. The maximum term of imprisonment for violation has been increased from one to five years, and the maximum fine raised from $1,000 to $5,000.

5. Subsection (d) is new. It would forbid the malicious damage or destruction of federal property by means of an explosive. The requirement of maliciousness is intended to exclude the application of this provision to accidental damage or authorized use of explosives on such property.

6. Subsection (e) is new. It would cover unauthorized possession of an explosive in a building used, possessed, occupied or leased by the Federal Government, in whole or in part. This is the only provision of the statute which punishes mere possession. Such a prohibition is justified because possession of explosives is so dangerous as to call for punishment whether or not the possessor intends to use the explosives for a criminal purpose.

7. Subsection (f) is another new provision. It would cover malicious bomb damage or destruction of any real or personal property used for business purposes by a person engaged in commerce or any activity affecting commerce. Since the term "affecting commerce" embraces "the fullest jurisdictional breadth constitutionally permissible under the Commerce Clause," NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226 (1963), this is an extremely broad provision. Like subsections (b) and (d), subsection (f) provides for more severe penalties in cases where injury or death results.

8. Subsection (g) is new. This subsection would cover possession of explosives with the knowledge or intent that they will be transported or used in violation of any of the other provisions of the section. It prescribes a maximum penalty of five years imprisonment, a $5,000 fine, or both.

9. Subsection (h), formerly subsection (e), constitutes a Congressional declaration of its intent not to pre-empt the field in which the statute applies. Minor revisions have been made in phraseology.

10. Subsection (i), a further expression of Congressional intent not to displace State and local jurisdiction and responsibility, provides that this section shall not be invoked except upon the express authority of the Attorney General or a designated Assistant Attorney General, on the basis of his judgment that a federal investigation or prosecution is in the public interest. It recognizes that most bombings and bomb threats will be investigated and prosecuted by State and local law enforcement personnel.

Section 2 of the bill appropriately amends the reference to section 837 in the analysis of Chapter 39.

S. 3651—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO AMEND THE FEDERAL FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC ACT RELATING TO FREQUENCY OF INSPECTIONS

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference a bill to amend the food and drug law which would require that the plants of drug manufacturers be inspected at least once every 6 months rather than every 2 years as the law reads at present.

In the course of the Senate Small Business Committee's Monopoly Subcommittee's hearings on competitive problems in the drug industry, it became clear that there is a very real need for proper and continuous inspection of drug manufacturing plants.

I wonder how many people are aware that as things stand at present, the American public can buy meat and even pet food which have been produced under more frequently inspected conditions than the drugs on which their health and life may depend. We can sit down and eat the meat we have purchased and generally not worry about whether or not it is wholesome. Meat products are packed under continuous Federal supervision. Meat processing and packaging plants have resident inspectors paid for by the Federal Government with the plant paying for any overtime.

We can feed our pets food which is packaged and labeled "Packed under continuous inspection of the U.S. Department of Agriculture." Pet foods which contain meat, fish, or poultry, in order to rate a seal of approval, not only are packed under continuous Federal supervision but are also inspected by State officials, generally backed up by the Food and Drug Administration.

Yet, when we purchase the drugs upon which our health and even life may depend, we have no such assurances. Under the 1962 Kefauver-Harris amendment to the Food and Drug Act, inspection of plants of drug manufacturers is required at a minimum of once every 2 years. That this has proven inadequate is easily seen on the basis of the large number of drug recalls carried out by the Food and Drug Administration year after year. These drugs are recalled because they do not meet the standards of either the U.S. Pharmacopeia or the National Formulary, the official compendia of the United States.

In testifying before our subcommittee at the second in our series of hearings, Dr. Solomon Garb, then professor of pharmacology and professor of community health at the University of Missouri Medical Center, stated:

> They (the American people) are entitled to wholesome, pure, effective and safe (drug) products. There is absolutely no excuse for having anything else on the market. The solution is inspection not one day out of every two years . . . but continuous inspection. . . .

Dr. Garb went on to say:

> Seven years ago I asked why we could not have the same safeguards for drugs that we have for dog food. Thus far I have not received a satisfactory reply. . . . Most drugs which are produced in this country today are being inspected by inspectors hired and paid for by the manufacturers and the costs are included in the price of the drugs. If we had continuous Government inspection, the costs should not increase . . . in the long run the cost of inspection would still be paid by the person who uses the drugs.

Mr. President, I submit that there is no place for any kind of substandard drug anywhere in America. It is essential that the American people have adequate safeguards as to the wholesomeness and purity of drug products. This, of course, will take continuous cooperative effort on the part of both the drug manufacturers and the Food and Drug Administration.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3651) to amend section 510(h) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act so as to require inspection thereunder at least once every 6 months of factories, warehouses, and establishments in which food, drugs, devices, and cosmetics are manufactured, processed, packed, or held, introduced by Mr. NELSON, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3652—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO REQUIRE THAT DRUG CONTAINER LABELS BEAR THE ESTABLISHED NAME OF THE DRUG DISPENSED

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

S. 3653—INTRODUCTION OF THE EXPLOSIVE COMPONENT CONTROL ACT OF 1970

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the sound of bombs is reverberating across the land. It is a sound that is frightening. It is a sound of terror.

In my own State of Connecticut, a police station was bombed in the city of Danbury, as a diversionary tactic during a bank robbery.

In New York City, the offices of three large corporations, involved in varying degrees in the Vietnam war effort, were shaken by bombs. An entire floor of one building was destroyed in a single blast.

In Maryland, two persons were blown to pieces when a bomb exploded in the car in which they were riding. Hours later, a blast leveled a part of the courthouse in Cambridge, Md.

In Greenwich Village, a townhouse, converted into a bomb factory by young militants, was completely destroyed. In inexperienced hands, the unstable chemical nitroglycerin exploded and killed the young bomb manufacturers.

The traditional forms of dissent have been supplanted by acts of violence and terror. The dynamite stick is replacing the protest placard; the bomb, the demonstration.

The injury, damage, and destruction that could result from the use of bombs in congested areas is a chilling potentiality, for it would take little of such terrorist activity to bring a large city to its knees.

In view of this situation, I was very pleased to note the action which the administration took yesterday to provide stiff Federal penalties for those involved in bombing or in bomb threats. This action may well prove to be significant as a deterrent to those who might engage in these terror tactics.

Nonetheless, an increased penalty structure as a deterrent will not solve the problem. Instead, we must move to regulate explosives and explosive devices before they reach the hands of those who should not have them.

In a majority of States, anyone can buy explosives and anyone can sell them. For the most part, State laws, where they do exist, are sorely inadequate.

Frankly, it is more difficult in most States to own and license a dog than it is to purchase a deadly package of explosives and explosive devices. In many jurisdictions, it is more difficult for someone under 16 to purchase a package of cigarettes than it is to buy a box of blasting caps.

It should be abundantly clear that Federal controls over the purchase of explosives and other bomb components are essential.

Industry wants them. The National Fire Protection Association has demanded them. And one of the Nation's large manufacturers and distributors of explosives, the Du Pont Corp., has recently urged speedy action to provide for Federal regulation of explosives so that those States without controls do not become suppliers for the arsenal of the radical militants.

To provide these controls, Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill entitled the Explosive Component Control Act. This legislation amends the Gun Control Act of 1968 by expanding the definition of destructive devices to cover under its regulatory provisions the main components of homemade bombs. Included within this new definition would be: any device, or chemical compound or mixture, which primarily functions or is customarily used as an explosive including, but not limited to, dynamite, black powder, pellet powder, initiating explosives, blasting caps, electric blasting caps, safety fuses, fuses, lighters, fuse igniters, nitroglycerin, picric acid, lead acid fulminate of mercury, and detonating primers.

All of these materials would be regulated in much the same way that the sale of firearms is now regulated.

In order to sell explosives or explosive devices, a manufacturer or dealer would have to secure a license from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The seller would be required to keep careful sales records, including the name and address of the purchaser and the quantity and kind of explosives or explosive devices that have been purchased.

In order to purchase explosives and explosive components, the buyer must submit an affidavit to the Secretary of the Treasury, and present a copy to the dealer, indicating that he is 21 years of age. The affidavit must also show that he is a bona fide employee or corporate officer of a business engaged in mining, construction, quarrying, agriculture, seismographic research, or that he is an individual who has a bona fide use for such devices.

While the Gun Control Act of 1968 prohibits the sale of firearms to nonresidents of the State in which the dealer operates, this bill allows an explosive manufacturer to sell the devices directly to a buyer in another State, provided that the affidavit mentioned above is submitted. I have added this section to the bill because I am well aware that a legitimate business located in a State like Nevada might well purchase explosives directly from a manufacturer located in a State like Delaware. It is probable that this practice has been going on for years, and I see absolutely no reason to hinder legitimate industry in the purchase of the tools necessary for its trade.

Increased criminal penalties are provided in this bill for commission of a felony with explosives. Under the Gun Control Act, the penalty for commission of a Federal felony while armed with a firearm was a sentence of not less than 1 year and not more than 10 years. While I have been steadfast in my opposition to the imposition of mandatory sentences, in the case of bombings, where hundreds could be killed or injured in a single incident, the penalty must be consistent with the gravity of the crime. Accordingly, I am proposing that the penalty for a felony using any of the items described above be raised from a 1-year minimum to a 10-year minimum sentence.

With this bill, I am hopeful that the alarmingly casual purchase of explosives will be completely eliminated. The purchase and use of these items are serious matters, and there should be effective legal barriers to prevent the terrorists and the irresponsible from buying and using them.

Mr. President, the situation is urgent, and I hope this bill will receive early attention. The longer we permit the unchecked purchase and stockpiling of weapons of terror, the greater will be the hold of fear and danger on our people. And the more tentative the security and tranquility of our cities and towns, the less capable we shall be of dealing with our other problems.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3653) to amend the Gun Control Act of 1968 to provide for better control of interstate traffic in explosive components, introduced by Mr. DODD, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 59 — CONCURRENT RESOLUTION SUBMITTED AND AGREED TO RELATING TO ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE FROM MARCH 26, 1970 UNTIL MARCH 31, 1970

Mr. MANSFIELD submitted a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 59) to provide for the adjournment of the Senate from March 26, 1970 until March 31, 1970, which was considered and agreed to.

SENATE RESOLUTION 381—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION TO EXPRESS THE SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING A TREATY ON HIJACKING AIRCRAFT

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I submit for reference to the appropriate committee a resolution which seeks to convey the sense of the Senate to the American delegation that will be attending the extraordinary session of the General Assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organization which has now been convened for this coming June 16.

The purpose of this conference will be to deal with the growing threat to air safety, including the threats posed by sabotage, bombing, and hijacking. I welcome the announcement, which was made yesterday morning, that there will be an extraordinary session of the ICAO General Assembly to deal with these problems.

I note in this connection that in the resolution which I introduced on January 29 of last year, I called for a special international conference, convened on an emergency basis, to deal with the problem of hijacking.

The entire situation has of course been gravely complicated in recent months by the midair bombings of two European aircraft, resulting in the loss of many innocent lives. I think it worth noting that three of the victims of the bombing of the Swiss airlines bound for Israel were prominent citizens in my own State.

As a result of a special conference which took place in Montreal in February of 1969, the ICAO legal committee was given the task of drafting a new treaty dealing with hijacking. It is my understanding that a draft treaty has now been prepared and that it will be acted on by a special diplomatic conference to be convened in December of this year.

I have been informed that the treaty drafted by the legal committee calls for either extradition or for prosecution under the laws of the country which receives the hijacked aircraft.

The Department of State feels that this represents a significant advance because it would automatically make hijacking an extraditable offense where extradition treaties exist; it is currently listed as such an offense in only two existing treaties. However, it is clear that the treaty would have absolutely no effect on Cuba, which, incidentally, continues to function as a member of ICAO.

The Department apparently has serious doubts about the wisdom of raising the question of mandatory extradition at the forthcoming General Assembly because of the adverse reaction from many countries the last time this proposal was made.

In introducing my resolution of January 29, 1969, I said that if a hijacking epidemic ever got underway in Communist Europe, it might soon make our own epidemic look like small potatoes. Since I made this statement, there have been a number of instances involving the hijacking or attempted hijacking of Communist-bloc aircraft.

If it was not clear to the Communist leaders previously, then it should be clear to them today that they have much to gain from an agreement that would effectively prevent hijacking by guaranteeing the automatic extradition of hijackers.

For this reason, I am in favor of having our delegation raise the problem for discussion at the ICAO General Assembly, even though I know that the proposed treaty can only be amended at the special diplomatic conference scheduled for this coming December.

I think there is everything to be gained and nothing to be lost by letting the members of ICAO know, and also letting the Soviet Union and other nonmember nations know, that the Congress of the United States is not satisfied with what has been proposed to date, and that we demand stronger action to deal with the situation.

I hope the Senators will give their support to this resolution as an indication of the attitude of the U.S. Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 381), which reads as follows, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 381

Whereas the past two years have witnessed a growing international epidemic of the hijacking of commercial airplanes, which has endangered the lives of many hundreds of passengers and resulted in serious inconvenience to both passengers and airlines; and

Whereas in recent months this danger has been further aggravated by two midair bomb explosions perpetrated by Arab terrorists against European planes bound for Israel or carrying mail for Israel, resulting in a heavy loss of innocent lives; and

Whereas pursuant to the call of ten nations (Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Federal Republic of Germany, Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom), an extraordinary session of the General Assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organization will be convening on June 16, 1970, to deal with the growing threats of air safety, including the threats posed by sabotage, bombing, and hijacking; and

Whereas the new draft treaty on hijacking drawn up by the ICAO legal committee for submission to a special diplomatic conference, does not call for the mandatory extradition of hijackers because there has heretofore been widespread opposition to this proposal among ICAO members; and

Whereas there is serious reason for believing that any action short of mandatory extradition would be ineffective in dealing with the problem of hijacking; and

Whereas there is reason to believe that, in consequence of the recent series of hijackings and attempted hijackings involving Communist planes, even the Communists might today be willing to reconsider their opposition to the mandatory extradition of hijackers;

Therefore be it resolved that it is the sense of the Senate

1. that the American delegation to the forthcoming General Assembly of ICAO should be instructed to raise the question of fortifying the draft treaty proposed by the ICAO legal committee by providing for the automatic extradition of hijackers, even in the absence of bilateral extradition treaties;

2. that it should also be instructed to raise the question of requiring member nations of ICAO to suspend bilateral flight agreements with those nations who refuse to agree to the automatic extradition of hijackers, or who condone or refuse to take action against terrorist organizations involved in attacks on passenger aircraft;

3. that the American delegation should press for a broad examination of other measures, technical and legal, that might be taken to further discourage and control the hijacking of commercial aircraft and terrorist operations against them.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, March 26, 1970, he presented to the President of the United States the bill (S. 2593) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to facilitate the entry of certain nonimmigrants into the United States, and for other purposes.

There being no objection the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Flood Control-Rivers and Harbors of the Committee on Public Works will hold a hearing on the matter of monetary authorization for the Central and Southern Florida Control Project, including consideration of the relationship of the project to the Everglades National Park.

The hearing wil be held on Wednesday, April 8, 1970, and will begin at 9:30 a.m., in Room 4200, New Senate Office Building.

Persons desiring to testify or to submit written statements in connection with this hearing should notify Mr. Joseph F. Van Vladricken, Professional Staff Member, Committe on Public Works, Room 4204, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 225-6176.

VERMONT CITIZENS MOBILIZE FOR GREEN-UP DAY ON APRIL 18

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, on Saturday, April 18, an army of Vermont citizens will be mobilized to participate in a statewide highway beautification program.

This unique, all-volunteer effort has been called "Green-Up Day."

The goal will be to pick up trash and other unsightly wastes which have been discarded along the roadsides of the Green Mountain State.

This program was conceived last year by Gov. Deane C. Davis.

It has also been given moral support by the Vermont General Assembly.

Vermont officials from State, civil, and local agencies are coordinating in this program.

But the muscle of this citizens' army will be the average Vermonter who has agreed to give up a day of his time in order to make his community, and Nation, a better place to live.

I have always felt that the best place to start projects of this kind is at home.

Not only will the Vermont Green-Up Day get the citizenry involved in cleaning up the highways, but it will also result in saving the taxpayers some money.

In Vermont about $200,000 a year is spent on cleaning up the roadsides.

As a result of Green-Up Day, State officials estimate that taxpayers' dollars will be saved.

In this time of national concern and, indeed, even alarm over the spoilation of our natural surroundings, I commend the citizens of Vermont for their decision to do something about the pollution problem.

It seems to me that President Nixon must have been thinking of Vermonters when on February 10 in his message to the Congress on the environment, the President said:

> The task of cleaning up our environment calls for total mobilization by all of us.
> It involves government at every level; it requires the help of every citizen.
> It cannot be a matter of simply sitting back and blaming someone else.
> Neither is it one to be left to a few hundred leaders.
> Rather it presents us with one of those rare situations in which each individual everywhere has an opportunity to make a special contribution to his country as well as his community.

Once again, Vermonters have shown that they do not sit back and let someone else do the job.

They are rolling up their sleeves and getting on with the job of cleaning up their surroundings.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of Governor Davis' proclamation designating April 18 as Green-Up Day, and a copy of the resolution approved by the Vermont General Assembly.

There being no objection, the proclamation and the resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, Vermont is presently engaged in a historical effort to preserve and protect its environment through legislation, education, citizen involvement, conservation groups and student, business, labor and industrial committees; and

Whereas, continued interest in the environment should be fostered by practical involvement of students and citizens in projects that promote ecological understanding and appreciation; and

Whereas, Vermonters are concerned about the maintenance and perpetuation of roadside beautification, marred each spring with the melting snows by the unsightly accumulation of trash and refuse; and

Whereas, awareness of this problem will be dramatically and uniquely fostered on GREEN UP DAY, Vermont's statewide clean up day involving a massive coordinating effort between state, civil and local agencies and the utilization of a volunteer army of thousands of citizens in every town in the State;

Now, therefore, I, Deane C. Davis, Governor of the State of Vermont, do hereby proclaim April 18, 1970 as: Green-Up Day in Vermont and urge all citizens to observe the day by volunteering two hours of their time to rid the highways of litter and to green up their neighborhoods.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of the State of Vermont this fourth day of March, A.D. 1970.

DEANE C. DAVIS,
Governor.

RESOLUTION

Whereas, Governor Deane C. Davis has proclaimed April 18, 1970 as Green Up Day in the State of Vermont and urged all citizens to observe the day by volunteering two hours of their time to rid the highways of litter and to green up their neighborhoods; and

Whereas, Vermont is presently engaged in an historical effort to preserve and protect its environment through legislation, education, citizen involvement, conservation groups and student, business, labor and industrial committees; and

Whereas, continued interest in the environment should be fostered by practical involvement of students and citizens in projects that promote ecological understanding and appreciation; and

Whereas, Vermonters are concerned about the maintenance and perpetuation of roadside beautification, marred each spring by the unsightly accumulation of trash and refuse; and

Whereas, awareness of this problem will be dramatically and uniquely fostered on Green Up Day, now therefore be it Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives; That all Vermonters be urged to join forces in a massive Green Up army on April 18, 1970, to remove highway litter, thereby preserving Vermont as a special way of life.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTEREST RATE CUT

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, the Irving Trust Co., America's 12th largest bank, cut its prime interest rate from 8½ percent down to 8 percent this morning. Major banks across the country, including the Nation's four largest, have responded and are also reducing their prime rates.

This is a welcome and significant response to President Nixon's efforts to cool the fires of inflation.

Even more important to some economists is the news that yesterday the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported wholesale prices for March showed the smallest increase in 7 months.

And industrial commodity prices scored their smallest rise since last July. We are, in other words, approaching a stable economy.

The anti-inflationary policies of the Nixon administration do seem to be working. The evidence of success continues to mount.

The interim objective of policy—to restrain economic expansion—is being realized. The ultimate objective—to reduce the rate of price inflation to an acceptable level—is being steadily achieved.

This morning's news of reductions in interest rates and a slowing down of price increases is heartening proof that we are, indeed, on the right track.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADMINISTRATION DESEGREGATION POLICY MAKES SENSE

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I applaud the President of the United States for his statement on Tuesday, March 24, setting forth in detail the administration's policies on the subject of desegregation of America's elementary and secondary schools. I commend him for the soundness of his views on this difficult problem that has created so much unhappiness and turmoil in all parts of our country.

His statement was realistic, it was reasonable, it was appropriate. I am glad to hear somebody at last say something that sounds as if he has his feet on the ground with respect to this issue. It was the first statement on this subject which has come from the White House within the past several years that has had the stamp of commonsense upon it.

There were many cogent sentences in the President's position paper, which I hope will not be forgotten. For example, he said:

> Demands that an arbitrary "racial balance" be established as a matter of right misinterpret the law and misstate the priorities.

The Supreme Court has never ruled that there must be racial balance, and the Congress has never so required by any legislative act. Moreover, to insist upon racial balance would be not only grossly impracticable in so many situations; it would also be inordinately costly. No good purpose would be achieved, but, quite to the contrary, bad matters would simply be made worse. Insistence upon racial balance is as unwise as it is unworkable.

The President reviewed the pertinent court decisions beginning with the historic Brown case in 1954, in which the Supreme Court laid down the principle that enforced segregation of students by race in the public schools is unconstitutional.

That decision was constitutionally sound and right. That is the law of the land, and I support it. However, the Supreme Court, in that decision, did not use the words "forced integration." And the court has never at any time outlawed freedom of choice or declared freedom of choice to be unconstitutional.

Of course, a few of the lower courts and a few overzealous bureaucrats have gone beyond the Supreme Court decisions on school desegregation.

But, as the President said, a review of school desegregation cases plainly shows that the decisions which have caused so much upheaval and confusion and agony in parts of the country are "untypical" and "the prevailing trend of judicial opinion is by no means so extreme."

The President noted that there are a number of questions involved in the school desegregation controversy on which the Supreme Court has not yet clearly spoken.

Mr. President, sanity needs to be restored in the mess that has been made of school desegregation. If the policies which Mr. Nixon has outlined are adhered to, I believe that sanity can be restored.

For too many years there has been far too much doctrinaire theory and too little common sense expressed in the complex problem of school desegregation. The Supreme Court has never said that all-white schools or all-black schools in a de facto situation are unconstitutional or unlawful, and I do not believe them to be unconstitutional or unlawful.

Moreover, in the 1964 Civil Rights Act, as the President pointed out, the Congress stated:

> Nothing herein shall empower any official or court of the United States to issue any order seeking to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another . . . in order to achieve such racial balance.

That language seems plain enough to me, as it apparently does to the President. Yet, we have seen attempt after attempt made to circumvent the will and intend of Congress by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and by some of the lower Federal courts.

Buttressing my belief that those who have sought to bring about total forced integration have gone considerably beyond what the Supreme Court has thus far required were the words of Chief Justice Burger in a decision earlier this month in which he noted that a number of "basic practical problems" have not been resolved, "including whether, as a constitutional matter, any particular racial balance must be achieved in the schools."

In view of these facts, I think the President has taken precisely the position he should have taken in expressing his opposition to "any compulsory busing of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance."

The truth, Mr. President, is that decisions of lower Federal courts on this matter of requiring an artificial racial mix in the schools are in conflict. There are disagreements over what is required—disagreements brought about primarily by the overzealous efforts of fanatics who would force everyone to their own way of thinking.

In all of this confusion, one thing is very clear: the Supreme Court, which ordered an end to forced segregation, has not yet ordered forced integration to bring about racial balance, and it may very well never go to such an undesirable and impracticable length.

The President's statement makes it plain that he is thoroughly aware of this fact; and it makes plain also that he is aware of the deep dissatisfaction of millions of American citizens—black and white—with the ruthless manner in which the education of children in so many areas is being sacrificed on the altar of fanatical devotion to forced integration in de facto situations.

The theorists, the fanatics—as the President correctly noted—have succeeded in heightening racial tensions and exacerbating racial frictions. In place of the impossible utopia they envisaged, they have created instead an educational chamber of frustration, uneasiness, and, in many instances, plain fear for countless numbers of American children. In the President's telling words:

> Children in many instances have not been served, they have been used—> in what all too often has proved a tragically futile effort to achieve in the schools the kind of multiracial society which the adult community has failed to achieve for itself.

They have been used, I repeat for emphasis.

The Nation has witnessed the predictable but understandable results that have followed: The flight of whites from the central cities; the decay of the cities; the erosion of the tax base; the deterioration of schools; the rise of school violence and crime; and a generation of inadequately educated children. These, Mr. President, are the end products of forced integration.

De facto segregation, based upon residential patterns, is not illegal, and I agree with Mr. Nixon that the Nation has a vital and special stake in upgrading education where de facto segregation exists. We should do everything possible to improve educational opportunity in racially impacted areas, with special emphasis placed upon equalizing those schools which are furthest behind.

If America means anything, it means opportunity—opportunity for all. But opportunity is not created by rigidly forcing children into unrealistic situations and hostile surroundings. Children and parents should have the right to decide the matters of school preference and attendance for themselves. After all, the parents who pay the taxes should have some say in where their children go to school.

In a free society, a mobile society such as ours, Mr. President, it is not possible to bring about a synthetic racial balance by executive order or judicial fiat. The final result of such tactics will inevitably be a de facto resegregation. Washington, D.C., is an example, with a school population that has become 95 percent Negro.

I seriously doubt that even the faulty social ends that are sought can be realized by such colossal judicial blunders as that which occurred in California, where a State court has ordered the Los Angeles school board to establish a racial balance in its 711 square mile district with its 775,000 children in 561 schools.

This draconian decree will cost the taxpayers there $40 million in the next year alone just to lease 1,600 unnecessary buses, to acquire facilities to house them, to hire drivers, and to buy gas and oil and tires. The annual additional cost in each subsequent year, it is estimated, will be $20 million. How much more sense it would make to use these funds for the upgrading of education itself. Money for schools is almost always in short supply. It ought to be used for better facilities and materials and methods, not frittered away to implement questionable notions of social readjustment.

The President made the valid point that only when Federal rulings and orders have the support of those at the local level can they be expected to produce the desired results. He emphasized the importance of neighborhood schools, and the essential necessity of having the cooperation of local school officials. What local school official could possibly react with anything but anger to such a high-handed decision as that rendered in Los Angeles?

The President is right when he insists upon minimum disruptions of education, and he recognizes that the neighborhood school is the most appropriate base for a system which puts the proper emphasis on education. In recent years, too much emphasis has been placed upon integration of the races and, as a result, education has become secondary. The primary purpose of the public school system is to educate children, black and white, but the cart has been placed before the horse by some of the lower courts and by some public officials. As a consequence, public education has suffered, private schools have proliferated, and the public school system has been undermined and impaired and, in fact, endangered.

Mr. Nixon said:

> If our schools fail to educate, then whatever they may achieve in integrating the races will turn out to be only a pyrrhic victory.

I agree completely with those views. The business of our schools is to educate, not to provide a meaningless and superficial racial mix. The social and economic status of Negro children can be improved much more surely through a policy which places the primary emphasis upon education rather than upon forced integration.

I was glad to hear the President say that—

> There are limits to the amount of Government coercion that can reasonably be used.

I also agree with the President's statement that—

> There has been an implicit assumption that blacks would be improved by association with whites.

Many Negroes in this country have come around to the view that forced integration is not an unmixed blessing for them, if it is, indeed, any blessing at all. They prefer spending more money on improving their own neighborhood schools and upgrading the quality of education there, and they want to see less hauling of their children around like cattle at great cost and distance just that they might look into white faces.

Many of us, Mr. President, rode the school bus when we were young, but we did it in order to get to the closest school which, in many instances, was several miles away from where we lived. Busing in such a situation could not be helped. But that was a far cry from the forced busing that is being visited upon some communities and some children today in order to comply with some theoretical formula requiring racial balance. May I say, as I have often said, it is sheer hypocrisy for Federal judges and legislators and other public officials to require other people's children to forcibly integrate while these same officials and judges are able to send their own children and grandchildren to private schools or they can afford to live in suburbia where the schools are mostly all white. And may I add, in this connection, that many of the pseudoliberal columnists who constantly prattle about the righteousness of forced integration simply do not know, or do not care, about the real problems that are involved, and one can surmise, their own children probably do not go within 10 miles of a school in which there are many blacks.

And what Mr. Nixon did not say, Mr. President, I shall say. Many parents are fearful of what might happen to their children when they are forced to go to schools like some of those in the Nation's Capital—where militants carry switchblade knives and guns and where shakedowns occur and where obscenities and profanity are the order of the day. It is a traumatic and unsettling experience for white children to be forced into an environment where they live in fear of being molested or attacked, robbed, and beaten. Some consideration should be given to the lasting psychic injury which may result to them, and no one should have difficulty in realizing that such a situation is not conducive to learning.

Mr. President, as an example of what happens in Washington, D.C. schools, I recall that in 1968 my Negro barber, here in the Capitol Building, came to me with an earnest plea that I assist him in getting his daughter, Brenda, transferred from the junior high school which she was then attending to another junior high school. He stated that his daughter had been attacked by five girls during the lunch hour and again after school, that she had been badly beaten and kicked, that she had lost 2 weeks of school from her classes, and that her life had been threatened to the point of death. I asked my barber to put the matter in writing, and I quote the following sentence from his letter:

> Whenever Brenda does return to school, we are afraid all progress in learning will be impeded by this ever pending danger and threat of further attacks which could result in sustaining injuries becoming more serious than before.

I contacted the board of education and was able to assist in having this little Negro girl transferred to another junior high school for the sake of her safety and peace of mind.

Mr. President, many Negro parents in the District of Columbia send their children to private schools out of consideration for their safety.

Moreover, to force fast learners to adjust their pace to that of slow learners is to sacrifice the welfare of intelligent children to the cult of mediocrity. This is often what happens—often what happens, in the mad rush to bring about some degree of racial balance.

Mr. Nixon said that:

> An open society does not have to be homogeneous or even fully integrated.

I commend the President on having the courage to speak the truth. It is time that the fanatical integrationists, the theorists, the pseudointellectuals, and the super-duper liberals realize the wisdom of the President's statement. It is not the statement of a segregationist; it is not the statement of one who is against voluntary integration. It is a statement which is realistic and which makes sense. It is a statement based upon sound and thoughtful judgment.

In summation, the President's speech expressed the following basic principles: That ours is a free and open society; that ours is a government of laws, that the law of the land will be upheld, but that there will be a limit to Government coercion; that every individual, black and white, must have an equal chance to go just as high and as far as his talents and energies will take him; that quality education and integration are not necessarily synonymous terms; and that, while de jure segregation is unconstitutional, de facto segregation is not.

His speech, Mr. President, was a speech for liberty, for freedom, for equality.

The President has done the Nation a service in clarifying his views and in forthrightly stating his administration's policy on school desegregation.

There will be a better day for education, and a better opportunity for all American children, black and white, throughout the land if the Nation now proceeds in accordance with the wise policy that President Nixon has enunciated.

Mr. President, I represent a border State, which is neither North nor South. But this is a national problem, and we, as U.S. Senators, should put the interests of public education, the interests of the Nation first. I believe that the approach to the problem proposed by the President puts the interests of the Nation and public education first.

Mr. President, a very fairminded liberal editorial on President Nixon's school desegregation statement was published in the Washington Star on yesterday, Wednesday, March 25, 1970, which I hope will be widely noted.

The editorial views Mr. Nixon's statement as one of landmark significance. As I have already indicated, I would have to agree, if for no other reason than the fact that the President's position is based on practical reality rather than on impractical theory. That, in itself, in my judgment, is something of a landmark.

I agree wholeheartedly with the Nixon statement on school desegregation. It should be obvious to all, save those who will not see, that forced integration, in an effort to bring about racial balance—even at the price of subordination of education—is not working and will not work.

Mr. President (Mr. CRANSTON), I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD and that it be followed in the RECORD by the Negro barber's correspondence and by the President's 8,000 word statement to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the editorial and the President's statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Mar. 25, 1970]

RACE AND THE SCHOOLS

President Nixon's 8,000-word message defining his administration's approach to the complex and crucial problems inherent in school desegregation, an issue which touches all our lives both as Americans and as parents, is of landmark significance.

Mr. Nixon made two particuarlly important points. The first is that whatever else it may achieve, a school system that does not educate has failed in its basic task. Children of all races, as the President points out, "have not been served but used" as the spearhead for achieving a social transformation "which the adult community has failed to achieve for itself."

The second is that it is evident that the school system alone is too fragile to bring about the color-blind society which the law requires, and which so many Americans of all races rightly cling to as a basic article of their political faith. It is clear that if this goal is to be achieved, the burden is one which must be borne not only by the schools but by other federal, state and local institutions and—more importantly—by each of us in our daily thoughts and acts.

There are those who will see in the President's emphasis on desegregation rather than integration, in his differentiation between vestigial unconstitutional de jure segregation and the socially-undesirable de facto segregation imposed by housing patterns, a presumptive "Southern strategy" and a retreat from the Warren Court's epochal Brown versus Board of Education decision of 1954. We do not see it.

Mr. Nixon has made it clear that, in his view, the neighborhood school is and must be the basic vehicle for educating our children. He holds that the busing of students for many hours each day across many miles to achieve an arbitrary racial balance—as ordered recently by a California state court at an estimated recurrent cost to the city of Los Angeles of $20 million—is both faulty educational practice and an inane use of limited funds.

We agree on both counts and are of the view that the great mass of parents—black and white—take the same position. All of us want to do what is right; at the same time, each of us wants the best education possible for his children. The two need not be incompatible.

The President asserts that his administration, in devising local plans for compliance with court desegregation orders, plans to give "primary weight" to the considered judgement of local school boards, "provided they act in good faith, and within constitutional limits." That, again, is wise. For only when local leaders actively back the rulings of the courts can there be hope of success. It is the abdication of responsibility by many leaders, white and black—not least in this city—which has resulted in the failures the children have had to bear.

To fund what he hopes will produce a return to educational sanity, Mr. Nixon intends to ask Congress to divert from "other domestic programs" $500 million for fiscal 1971 and twice that sum the following year to improve education in "racially impacted areas" in both the North and the South. Some of this money the President sees being used in area centers to which children would come from their neighborhood schools for supplementary educational activities on racially "neutral" territory. The idea is interesting and certainly deserves exploration, as does his reiterated proposal for creation of a National Institute of Education to help us to understand—and solve—the problems we face.

One means of achieving the integrated society we must eventually achieve is education. What matters is less the pigmentation of individual schools than the quality of the education each offers. The President to his credit, has given public recognition to this truth.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
November 15, 1968.

To: The Honorable Robert Byrd.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: On November 1, 1968, Brenda, age 13, an 8th grade student attending Banneker Junior High School, located on Georgia Avenue and Euclid, was attacked by five (5) girls during the lunch hour (12:00 noon) and again after school (3:00 P.M.). She was badly beaten and kicked.

As a result of this attack, Brenda has lost two weeks out of school and from her classes, which means, this time must be made up before the end of this year or may cause her to repeat some of these classes, and most of all, we have a fear for her life. At the time of the attack, her life was threatened to the point of death. Whenever Brenda does return to school, we are afraid all progress in learning will be impeded by this ever pending danger and threat of further attacks which could result in sustaining injuries becoming more serious than before.

It was suggested that a transfer to another Junior High School within the boundaries and not too far from our home could be a solution. Although a hardship would be imposed on us, we are willing to risk this imposition for the safety and welfare of Brenda. The Jr High School, we had in mind, is Garnet Patterson located at 10th and Vermont Avenue, N.W.

We would greatly appreciate all efforts within your power to help us in this critical matter. We would further ask you to look into this matter as soon as possible due to the loss of time for Brenda in her classes and the difficult time spent in trying to tie in school, home and our employment schedules. We also appreciate any help in initiating any action or actions in transferring Brenda to the suggested school or any other suggestions and actions you may advise. Again, we wish to thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

E. G.

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT ON ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

My purpose in this statement is to set forth in detail this Administration's policies on the subject of desegregation of America's elementary and secondary schools.

Few public issues are so emotionally charged as that of school desegregation, few so wrapped in confusion and clouded with misunderstanding. None is more important to our national unity and progress.

This issue is not partisan. It is not sectional. It is an American issue, of direct and immediate concern to every citizen.

I hope that this statement will reduce the prevailing confusion and will help place public discussion of the issue on a more rational and realistic level in all parts of the nation. It is time to strip away the hypocrisy, the prejudice and the ignorance that too long have characterized discussion of this issue.

My specific objectives in this statement are:

—To reaffirm my personal belief that the 1954 decision of the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education was right in both Constitutional and human terms.

—To assess our progress in the 16 years since Brown and to point the way to continuing progress.

—To clarify the present state of the law, as developed by the courts and the Congress, and the Administration policies guided by it.

—To discuss some of the difficulties encountered by courts and communities as desegregation has accelerated in recent years, and to suggest approaches that can mitigate such problems as we complete the process of compliance with Brown.

—To place the question of school desegregation in its larger context, as part of America's historic commitment to the achievement of a free and open society.

Anxiety over this issue has been fed by many sources.

On the one hand, some have interpreted various Administration statements and actions as a backing away from the principle of Brown—and have therefore feared that the painstaking work of a decade and a half might be undermined. We are not backing away. The Constitutional mandate will be enforced.

On the other hand, several recent decisions by lower courts have raised widespread fears that the nation might face a massive disruption of public education; that wholesale compulsory busing may be ordered and the neighborhood school virtually doomed. A comprehensive review of school desegregation cases indicates that these latter are untypical decisions, and that the prevailing trend of judicial opinion is by no means so extreme.

Certain changes are needed in the nation's approach to school desegregation. It would be remarkable if sixteen years of hard, often tempestuous experience had not taught us something about how better to manage the task with a decent regard for the legitimate interests of all concerned—and especially the children. Drawing on this experience, I am confident the remaining problems can be overcome.

WHAT THE LAW REQUIRES

In order to determine what ought to be done, it is important first to be as clear as possible about what must be done.

We are dealing fundamentally with inalienable human rights, some of them constitutionally protected. The final arbiter of Constitutional questions is the United States Supreme Court.

The President's responsibility

There are a number of questions involved in the school controversy on which the Supreme Court has not yet spoken definitely. Where it has spoken, its decrees are the law. Where it has not spoken, where Congress has not acted, and where differing lower courts have left the issue in doubt, my responsibilities as Chief Executive make it necessary that I determine, on the basis of my best judgment, what must be done.

In reaching that determination, I have sought to ascertain the prevailing judicial view as developed in decisions by the Supreme Court and the various Circuit Courts of Appeals. In this statement I list a number of principles derived from that prevailing judicial view. I accept those principles and shall be guided by them. The Departments and agencies of the Government will adhere to them.

A few recent cases in the lower courts have gone beyond those generally accepted principles. Unless affirmed by the Supreme Court, I will not consider them as precedents to guide Administration policy elsewhere.

What the Supreme Court has said

To determine the present state of the law, we must first remind ourselves of the recent history of Supreme Court rulings in this area.

This begins with the Brown case in 1954, when the Court laid down the principle that deliberate segregation of students by race in the public schools was unconstitutional. In that historic ruling, the court gave legal sanction to two fundamental truths—that separation by law establishes schools that are inherently unequal, and that a promise of equality before the law cannot be squared with use of the law to establish two classes of people, one black and one white.

The Court requested further argument, however, and propounded the following questions, among others:

"Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment.

"a. would a decrease necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"b. may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

In its second Brown decision the following year, the Court addressed itself to these questions of manner and timing of compliance. Its ruling included these principles:

Local school problems vary: school authorities have the primary responsibility for solving these problems; courts must consider whether these authorities are acting in good faith.

The courts should be guided by principles of equity, which traditionally are characterized by a practical flexibility in shaping its remedies and by a facility for adjusting and reconciling public and private needs."

Compliance must be achieved "with all deliberate speed," including "a prompt and reasonable start" toward achieving full compliance "at the earliest practicable date."

In 1964, the Supreme Court spoke again: "The time for mere 'deliberate speed' has run out, and that phrase can no longer justify denying these . . . children their constitutional rights."

At the same time, Congress also added to the impetus of desegregation by passing the Civil Rights Act of 1964, an Act that as a private citizen I endorsed and supported.

Although the Supreme Court in the Brown cases concerned itself primarily, if not exclusively, with pupil assignments, its decree applied also to teacher assignments and school facilities as a whole.

In 1968, the Supreme Court reiterated the principle enunciated in prior decisions, that teacher assignments are an important aspect of the basic task of achieving a public school system wholly freed from racial discrimination. During that same year, in another group of Supreme Court decisions, a significant and new set of principles also emerged.

That a school board must establish "that its proposed plan promises meaningful and immediate progress toward disestablishing State-imposed segregation," and that the plan must "have real prospects for dismantling the State-imposed dual system 'at the earliest practical date.'"

That one test of whether a school board has met its "affirmative duty to take whatever steps might be necessary to convert to a unitary system in which racial discrimination would be eliminated root and branch" is the extent to which racial separation persists under its plan.

That the argument that effective desegregation might cause white families to flee the neighborhood cannot be used to sustain devices designed to perpetuate segregation.

That when geographic zoning is combined with "free transfers," and the effect of the transfer privilege is to perpetuate segregation despite the zoning, the plan is unacceptable.

The most recent decisions by the Supreme Court have now rejected any further delay, adding to the Court's mandate:

"The obligation of every school district is to terminate dual systems at once and to operate now and hereafter only unitary schools."

That the obligation of such districts is an affirmative one and not a passive one.

That freedom of choice plans could no longer be considered as an appropriate substitute for the affirmative obligation imposed by the Court unless they, in fact, discharge that obligation immediately.

The Court has dealt only in very general terms with the question of what constitutes a "unitary" system, referring to it as one "within which no person is to be effectively excluded from any school because of race or color." It has not spoken definitely on whether or not, or the extent to which, "desegregation" may mean "integration."

In an opinion earlier this month, Chief Justice Burger pointed out a number of "basic practical problems" which the Court had not yet resolved, "including whether, as a Constitutional matter, any particular racial balance must be achieved in the schools; to what extent school districts and zones may or must be altered as a Constitutional matter; to what extent transportation may or must be provided to achieve the ends sought by prior holdings of this Court."

One of these areas of legal uncertainty cited by Chief Justice Burger—school transportation—involves Congressional pronouncements.

In the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Congress stated, ". . . nothing herein shall empower any official or court of the United States to issue any order seeking to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another or one school district to another in order to achieve such racial balance, or otherwise enlarge the existing power of the court to insure compliance with constitutional standards."

In the 1966 amendments to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Congress further stated, ". . . nothing contained in this Act shall . . . require the assignment or transportation of students or teachers in order to overcome racial imbalance."

I am advised that these provisions cannot constitutionally be applied to de jure segregation. However, not all segregation as it exists today is de jure.

I have consistently expressed my opposition to any compulsory busing of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance.

What the lower courts have said

In the absence of definitive Supreme Court rulings, these and other "basic practical problems" have been left for case-by-case determination in the lower courts—and both real and apparent contradictions among some of these lower court rulings have generated considerable public confusion about what the law really requires.

In an often-cited case in 1955 (Briggs v. Elliott), a District Court held that "the Constitution . . . does not require integration. . . . It merely forbids the use of governmental power to enforce segregation."

But in 1966 another court took issue with this doctrine, pointing out that it had been used as justifying "techniques for perpetuating school segregation," and declaring that: ". . . the only adequate redress for a previously overt system-wide policy of segregation directed against Negroes as a collective entity is a system-wide policy of integration."

In 1969, the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals declared:

"The famous Briggs v. Elliott dictum—adhered to by this court for many years—that the Constitution forbids segregation but does not require integration . . . is now dead."

Cases in two circuit courts have held that the continued existence of some all-black schools in a formerly segregated district did not demonstrate unconstitutionality, with one noting that there is "no duty to balance the races in the school system in conformity with some mathematical formula."

Another circuit court decision declared that even though a district's geographic zones were based on objective, nonracial criteria, the fact that they failed to produce any significant degree of integration meant that they were unconstitutional.

Two very recent Federal court decisions continue to illustrate the range of opinion: a plan of a southern school district has been upheld even though three schools would remain all-black, but a northern school system has been ordered by another Federal court to integrate all of its schools completely "by the revising of boundary lines for attendance purposes as well as busing so as to achieve maximum racial integration."

This range of differences demonstrates that lawyers and judges have honest disagreements about what the law requires. There have been some rulings that would divert such huge sums of money to non-educational purposes, and would create such severe dislocations of public school systems, as to impair the primary function of providing a good education. In one, for example—probably the most extreme judicial decree so far—a California State court recently ordered the Los Angeles School Board to establish a virtually uniform racial balance throughout its 711 square mile district, with its 775,000 children in 561 schools. Local leaders anticipate that this decree would impose an expenditure of $40,000,000 over the next school year to lease 1,600 buses, to acquire site locations to house them, to hire drivers, and to defray operating costs. Subsequent costs would approximate $20,000,000 annually. Some recent rulings by federal district courts applicable to other school districts appear to be no less severe.

I am dedicated to continued progress toward a truly desegregated public school system. But, considering the always heavy demands for more school operating funds, I believe it is preferable, when we have to make the choice, to use limited financial resources for the improvement of education—for better teaching facilities, better methods, and advanced educational materials—and for the upgrading of the disadvantaged areas in the community rather than buying buses, tires and gasoline to transport young children miles away from their neighborhood schools.

What most of the courts agree on

Despite the obvious confusion, a careful survey of rulings both by the Supreme Court and by the Circuit Courts of Appeals suggests that the basic judicial approach may be more reasonable than some have feared. Whatever a few lower courts might have held to the contrary, the prevailing trend of judicial opinion appears to be summed up in these principles:

—There is a fundamental distinction between so-called "de jure" and "de facto" segregation: de jure segregation arises by law or by the deliberate act of school officials and is unconstitutional; de facto segregation results from residential housing patterns and does not violate the Constitution. (The clearest example of de jure segregation is the dual school system as it existed in the South prior to the decision in Brown—two schools, one Negro and one White, comprised of the same grades and serving the same geographical area. This is the system with which most of the decisions, and the Supreme Court cases up until now, have been concerned.)

—Where school boards have demonstrated a good-faith effort to comply with court rulings, the courts have generally allowed substantial latitude as to method—often making the explicit point that administrative choices should, wherever possible, be made by the local school authorities themselves.

—In devising particular plans, questions of cost, capacity, and convenience for pupils and parents are relevant considerations.

—Whatever the racial composition of student bodies, faculties and staff must be assigned in a way that does not contribute to identifying a given school as "Negro," or "White."

—In school districts that previously operated dual systems, affirmative steps toward integration are a key element in disestablishing the dual system. This positive integration, however, does not necessarily have to result in "racial balance" throughout the system. When there is racial separation in housing, the Constitutional requirement has been held satisfied even though some schools remained all-black.

—While the dual school system is the most obvious example, de jure segregation is also found in more subtle forms. Where authorities have deliberately drawn attendance zones or chosen school locations for the express purpose of creating and maintaining racially separate schools, de jure segregation is held to exist. In such a case the school board has a positive duty to remedy it. This is so even though the board ostensibly operates a unitary system.

—In determining whether school authorities are responsible for existing racial separation—and thus whether they are Constitutionally required to remedy it—the intent of their action in locating schools, drawing zones, etc., is a crucial factor.

—In the case of genuine de facto segregation (i.e., where housing patterns produce substantially all-Negro or all-White schools, and where this racial separation has not been caused by deliberate official action) school authorities are not Constitutionally required to take any positive steps to correct the imbalance.

To summarize: There is a Constitutional mandate that dual school systems and other forms of de jure segregation be eliminated totally. But within the framework of that requirement an area of flexibility—a "rule of reason"—exists, in which school boards, acting in good faith, can formulate plans of desegregation which best suit the needs of their own localities.

De facto segregation, which exists in many areas both North and South, is undesirable but is not generally held to violate the Constitution. Thus, residential housing patterns may result in the continued existence of some all-Negro schools even in a system which fully meets Constitutional standards. But in any event, local school officials may, if they so choose, take steps beyond the Constitutional minimums to diminish racial separation.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION TODAY

The progress

Though it began slowly, the momentum of school desegregation has become dramatic.

Thousands of school districts throughout the South have met the requirements of law.

In the past year alone, the number of black children attending southern schools held to be in compliance has doubled, from less than 600,000 to nearly 1,200,000—representing 40 per cent of the Negro student population.

In most cases, this has been peacefully achieved.

However, serious problems are being encountered both by communities and by courts—in part as a consequence of this accelerating pace.

The problems

In some communities, racially mixed schools have brought the community greater interracial harmony; in others they have heightened racial tension and exacerbated racial frictions. Integration is no longer seen automatically and necessarily as an unmixed blessing for the Negro, Puerto Rican or Mexican-American child. "Racial balance" has been discovered to be neither a static nor a finite condition; in many cases it has turned out to be only a way station on the road to resegregation. Whites have deserted the public schools, often for grossly inadequate private schools. They have left the now resegregated public schools foundering for lack of support. And when whites flee the central city in pursuit of all—or predominantly—white schools in the suburbs, it is not only the central city schools that become racially isolated, but the central city itself.

These are not theoretical problems, but actual problems. They exist not just in the realm of law, but in the realm of human attitudes and human behavior. They are part of the real world, and we have to take account of them.

The complexities

Courts are confronted with problems of equity, and administrators with problems of policy. For example: To what extent does desegregation of duel systems require positive steps to achieve integration? How are the rights of individual children and their parents to be guarded in the process of enforcement? What are the educational impacts of the various means of desegregation—and where they appear to conflict, how should the claims of education be balanced against those of integration? To what extent should desegregation plans attempt to anticipate the problem of resegregation?

These questions suggest the complexity of the problems. These problems confront us in the North as well as the South, and in rural communities, suburbs and central cities.

The troubles in our schools have many sources. They stem in part from deeply rooted racial attitudes; in part from differences in social, economic and behavioral patterns; in part from weaknesses and inequities in the educational system itself; in part from the fact that by making schools the primary focus of efforts to remedy long-standing social ills, in some cases greater pressure has been brought to bear on the schools than they could withstand.

The context

Progress toward school desegregation is part of two larger processes, each equally essential:

The improvement of educational opportunities for all of America's children.

The lowering of artificial racial barriers in all aspects of American life.

Only if we keep each of these considerations clearly in mind—and only if we recognize their separate natures—can we approach the question of school desegregation realistically.

It may be helpful to step back for a moment, and to consider the problem of school desegregation in its larger context.

The school stands in a unique relationship to the community, to the family, and to the individual student. It is a focal point of community life. It has a powerful impact on the future of all who attend. It is a place not only of learning, but also of living—where a child's friendships center, where he learns to measure himself against others, to share, to compete, to cooperate—and it is the one institution above all others with which the parent shares his child.

Thus it is natural that whatever affects the schools stirs deep feelings among parents, and in the community at large.

Whatever threatens the schools, parents perceive—rightly—as a threat to their children.

Whatever makes the schools more distant from the family undermines one of the important supports of learning.

Quite understandably, the prospect of any abrupt change in the schools is seen as a threat.

As we look back over these sixteen years, we find that many changes that stirred fears when they first were ordered have turned out well. In many Southern communities, black and white children now learn together—and both the schools and the communities are better where the essential changes have been accomplished in a peaceful way.

But we also have seen situations in which the changes have not worked well. These have tended to command the headlines, thus increasing the anxieties of those still facing change.

Overburdening the schools

One of the mistakes of past policy has been to demand too much of our schools: They have been expected not only to educate, but also to accomplish a social transformation. Children in many instances have not been served, but used—in what all too often has proved a tragically futile effort to achieve in the schools the kind of a multi-racial society which the adult community has failed to achieve for itself.

If we are to be realists, we must recognize that in a free society there are limits to the amount of government coercion that can reasonably be used; that in achieving desegregation we must proceed with the least possible disruption of the education of the nation's children; and that our children are highly sensitive to conflict, and highly vulnerable to lasting psychic injury.

Failing to recognize these factors, past policies have placed on the schools and the children too great a share of the burden of eliminating racial disparities throughout our society. A major part of this task falls to the schools. But they cannot do it all or even most of it by themselves. Other institutions can share the burden of breaking down racial barriers, but only the schools can perform the task of education itself. If our schools fail to educate, then whatever they may achieve in integrating the races will turn out to be only a pyrrhic victory.

With housing patterns what they are in many places in the nation, the sheer numbers of pupils and the distances between schools make full and prompt school integration in every such community impractical—even if there were a sufficient desire on the part of the community to achieve it. In Los Angeles, 78 per cent of all Negro pupils attend schools that are 95 per cent or more black. In Chicago the figure is 85 per cent—the same as in Mobile, Alabama. Many smaller cities have the same patterns. Nationwide, 61 per cent of all Negro students attend schools which are 95 per cent or more black.

Demands that an arbitrary "racial balance" be established as a matter of right misinterpret the law and misstate the priorities.

As a matter of educational policy, some school boards have chosen to arrange their school systems in such a way as to provide a greater measure of racial integration. The important point to bear in mind is that where the existing racial separation has not been caused by official action, this increased integration is and should remain a matter for local determination.

Pupil assignments involve problems which do not arise in the case of the assignment of teachers. If school administrators were truly color blind and teacher assignments did not reflect the color of the teacher's skin, the law of averages would eventually dictate an approximate racial balance of teachers in each school within a system.

Available data on the educational effects of integration are neither definitive nor comprehensive. But such data as we have suggest strongly that, under the appropriate conditions, racial integration in the classroom can be a significant factor in improving the quality of education for the disadvantaged. At the same time, the data lead us into several more of the complexities that surround the desegregation issue.

For one thing, they serve as a reminder that, from an educational standpoint, to approach school questions solely in terms of race is to go astray. The data tell us that in educational terms, the significant factor is not race but rather the educational environment in the home—and indeed, that the single most important educational factor in a school is the kind of home environment its pupils come from. As a general rule, children from families whose home environment encourages learning—whatever their race—are higher achievers; those from homes offering little encouragement are lower achievers.

Which effect the home environment has depends on such things as whether books and magazines are available, whether the family subscribes to a newspaper, the educational level of the parents, and their attitude toward the child's education.

The data strongly suggest, also, that in order for the positive benefits of integration to be achieved, the school must have a majority of children from environments that encourage learning—recognizing, again, that the key factor is not race but the kind of home the child comes from. The greater concentration of pupils whose homes encourage learning—of whatever race—the higher the achievement levels not only of those pupils, but also of others in the same school. Students learn from students. The reverse is also true: the greater concentration of pupils from homes that discourage learning, the lower the achievement levels of all.

We should bear very carefully in mind, therefore, the distinction between educational difficulty as a result of race, and educational difficulty as a result of social or economic levels, of family background, of cultural patterns, or simply of bad schools. Providing better education for the disadvantaged requires a more sophisticated approach than mere racial mathematics.

In this same connection, we should recognize that a smug paternalism has characterized the attitudes of many white Americans toward school questions. There has been an implicit assumption that blacks or others of minority races would be improved by association with whites. The notion that an all-black or predominantly-black school is automatically inferior to one which is all or predominantly-white—even though not a product of a dual system—inescapably carries racist overtones. And, of course, we know of hypocrisy: not a few of those in the North most stridently demanding racial integration of public schools in the South at the same time send their children to private schools to avoid the assumed inferiority of mixed public schools.

It is unequestionably true that most black schools—though by no means all—are in fact inferior to most white schools. This is due in part to past neglect or shortchanging of the black schools; and in part to long-term patterns of racial discrimination which caused a greater proportion of Negroes to be left behind educationally, left out culturally, and trapped in low paying jobs. It is not really because they serve black children that most of these schools are inferior, but rather because they serve poor children who often lack the home environment that encourages learning.

Innovative approaches

Most public discussion of overcoming racial isolation centers on such concepts as compulsory "busing"—taking children out of the schools they would normally attend, and forcing them instead to attend others more distant, often in strange or even hostile neighborhoods. Massive "busing" is seen by some as the only alternative to massive racial isolation.

However, a number of new educational ideas are being developed, designed to provide the educational benefits of integration without depriving the student of his own neighborhood school.

For example, rather than attempting dislocation of whole schools, a portion of a child's educational activities may be shared with children from other schools. Some of his education is in a "home-base" school, but some outside it. This "outside learning" is in settings that are defined neither as black nor white, and sometimes in settings that are not even in traditional school buildings. It may range all the way from intensive work in reading to training in technical skills, and to joint efforts such as drama and athletics.

By bringing the children together on "neutral" territory friction may be dispelled; by limiting it to part-time activities no one would be deprived of his own neighborhood school; and the activities themselves provide the children with better education.

This sort of innovative approach demonstrates that the alternatives are not limited to perpetuating racial isolation on the one hand, and massively disrupting existing school patterns on the other. Without uprooting students, devices of this kind can provide an additional educational experience within an integrated setting. The child gains both ways.

Good faith and the courts

Where desegregation proceeds under the mandate of law, the best results require that the plans be carefully adapted to local circumstances.

A sense of compassionate balance is indispensable. The concept of balance is no stranger to our Constitution. Even First Amendment freedoms are not absolute and unlimited; rather the scales of that "balance" have been adjusted with minute care, case by case, and the process continues.

In my discussion of the status of school desegregation law, I indicated that the Supreme Court has left a substantial degree of latitude within which specific desegregation plans can be designed. Many lower courts have left a comparable degree of latitude. This does not mean that the courts will tolerate or the Administration condone evasions or subterfuges; it does mean that if the essential element of good faith is present, it should ordinarily be possible to achieve legal compliance with a minimum of educational disruption, and through a plan designed to be responsive to the community's own local circumstances.

This matter of good faith is critical.

Thus the far-sighted local leaders who have demonstrated good faith by smoothing the path of compliance in their communities have helped lay the basis for judicial attitudes taking more fully into account the practical problems of compliance.

How the Supreme Court finally rules on the major issues it has not yet determined can have a crucial impact on the future of public education in the United States.

Traditionally, the Court has refrained from deciding Constitutional questions until it became necessary. This period of legal uncertainty has occasioned vigorous controversy over what the thrust of the law should be.

As a nation, we should create a climate in which these questions, when they finally are decided by the Court, can be decided in a framework most conducive to reasonable and realistic interpretation.

We should not provoke any court to push a Constitutional principle beyond its ultimate limit in order to compel compliance with the court's essential, but more modest, mandate. The best way to avoid this is for the nation to demonstrate that it does intend to carry out the full spirit of the Constitutional mandate.

POLICIES OF THE ADMINISTRATION

It will be the purpose of this Administration to carry out the law fully and fairly. And where problems exist that are beyond the mandate of legal requirements, it will be our purpose to seek solutions that are both realistic and appropriate.

I have instructed the Attorney General, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and other appropriate officials of the Government to be guided by these basic principles and policies:

Principles of enforcement

Deliberate racial segregation of pupils by official action is unlawful, wherever it exists. In the words of the Supreme Court, it must be eliminated "root and branch"—and it must be eliminated at once.

Segregation of teachers must be eliminated. To this end, each school system in this nation, North and South, East and West, must move immediately, as the Supreme Court has ruled, toward a goal under which "in each school the ratio of White to Negro faculty members is substantially the same as it is throughout the system."

With respect to school facilities, school administrators throughout the nation, North and South, East and West, must move immediately, also in conformance with the Court's ruling, to assure that schools within individual school districts do not discriminate with respect to the quality of facilities or the quality of education delivered to the children within the district.

In devising local compliance plans, primary weights should be given to the considered judgment of local school boards—provided they act in good faith, and within Constitutional limits.

The neighborhood school will be deemed the most appropriate base for such a system.

Transportation of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance will not be required.

Federal advice and assistance will be made available on request, but Federal officials should not go beyond the requirements of law in attempting to impose their own judgment on the local school district.

School boards will be encouraged to be flexible and creative in formulating plans that are educationally sound and that result in effective desegregation.

Racial imbalance in a school system may be partly de jure in origin, and partly de facto. In such case, it is appropriate to insist on remedy for the de jure portion, which is unlawful without insisting on a remedy for the lawful de facto portion.

De facto racial separation, resulting genuinely from housing patterns, exist in the South as well as the North; in neither area should this condition by itself be cause for Federal enforcement actions. De jure segregation brought about by deliberate school-board gerrymandering exists in the North as the South; in both areas this must be remedied. In all respects, the law should be applied equally, North and South, East and West.

This is one nation. We are one people. I feel strongly that as Americans we must be done, now and for all future time, with the divisive notion that these problems are sectional.

Policies for progress

In those communities facing desegregation orders, the leaders of the communities will be encouraged to lead—not in defiance, but in smoothing the way of compliance. One clear lesson of experience is that local leadership is a fundamental factor in determining success or failure. Where leadership has been present, where it has been mobilized, where it has been effective, many districts have found that they could, after all, desegregate their schools successfully. Where local leadership has failed, the community has failed—and the schools and the children have borne the brunt of that failure.

We shall launch a concerted, sustained and honest effort to assemble and evaluate the lessons of experience: to determine what methods of school desegregation have worked, in what situations, and why—and also what has not worked. The Cabinet-level working group I recently appointed will have as one of its principal functions amassing just this sort of information and helping make it available to the communities in need of assistance.

We shall attempt to develop a far greater body of reliable data than now exists on the effects of various integration patterns on the learning process. Our effort must always be to preserve the educational benefit for the children.

We shall explore ways of sharing more broadly the burdens of social transition that have been laid disproportionately on the schools—ways, that is, of shifting to other public institutions a greater share of the task of undoing the effects of racial isolation.

We shall seek to develop and test a varied set of approaches to the problems associated with "de facto" segregation, North as well as South.

We shall intensify our efforts to ensure that the gifted child—the potential leader—is not stifled intellectually merely because he is black or brown or lives in a slum.

While raising the quality of education in all schools, we shall concentrate especially on racially-impacted schools, and particularly on equalizing those schools that are furthest behind.

Words often ring empty without deeds. In government, words can ring even emptier without dollars.

In order to give substance to these commitments, I shall ask Congress to divert $500 million from my previous budget requests for other domestic programs for Fiscal 1971, to be put instead into programs for improving education in racially-impacted areas, North and South, and for assisting school districts in meeting special problems incident to court-ordered desegregation. For Fiscal 1972, I have ordered that $1 billion be budgeted for the same purposes.

I am not content simply to see this money spent, and then to count the spending as the measurement of accomplishment. For much too long, national "commitments" have been measured by the number of Federal dollars spent rather than by more valid measures such as the quality of imagination displayed, the amount of private energy enlisted or, even more to the point, the results achieved.

If this $1.5 billion accomplishes nothing, then the commitment will mean nothing.

If it enables us to break significant new ground, then the commitment will mean everything.

This I deeply believe:

Communities desegregating their schools face special needs—for classrooms, facilities, teachers, teacher training—and the nation should help meet those needs.

The nation also has a vital and special stake in upgrading education where de facto segregation persists—and where extra efforts are needed if the schools are to do their job. These schools, too, need extra money for teachers and facilities.

Beyond this, we need to press forward with innovative new ways of overcoming the effects of racial isolation and of making up for environmental deficiencies among the poor.

I have asked the Vice President's Cabinet Committee on School Desegregation, together with the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, to consult with experts in and out of government and prepare a set of recommended criteria for the allocation of these funds.

I have specified that these criteria should give special weight to four categories of need:

—The special needs of desegregating (or recently desegregated) districts for additional facilities, personnel and training required to get the new, unitary system successfully started.

—The special needs of racially-impacted schools where de facto segregation persists—and where immediate infusions of money can make a real difference in terms of educational effectiveness.

—The special needs of those districts that have the furthest to go to catch up educationally with the rest of the nation.

—The financing of innovative techniques for providing educationally sound inter-racial experiences for children in racially isolated schools.

This money—the $500 million next year, and $1 billion in Fiscal 1972—must come from other programs. Inevitably, it represents a further reordering of priorities on the domestic scene. It represents a heightened priority for making school desegregation work, and for helping the victims of racial isolation learn.

Nothing is more vital to the future of our nation than the education of its children; and at the heart of equal opportunity is equal educational opportunity. These funds will be an investment in both the quality and the equality of that opportunity.

This money is meant to provide help now, where help is needed now.

As we look to the longer-term future, it is vital that we concentrate more effort on understanding the process of learning—and improving the process of teaching. The educational needs we face cannot be met simply with more books, more classrooms and more teachers—however urgently these are needed now in schools that face shortages. We need more effective methods of teaching, and especially of teaching those children who are hardest to reach and most lacking in a home environment that encourages learning.

In my message on education reform earlier this month, I proposed creation of a National Institute of Education to conduct and to sponsor basic and applied educational research—with special emphasis on compensatory education for the disadvantaged, on the Right to Read, on experimental schools and on the use of television for educational purposes.

I repeat that proposal—and I ask that the Congress consider it a matter of high priority.

A FREE AND OPEN SOCIETY

The goal of this Administration is a free and open society. In saying this, I use the words "free" and "open" quite precisely.

Freedom has two essential elements: the right to choose, and the ability to choose. The right to move out of a mid-city slum, for example, means little without the means of doing so. The right to apply for a good job means little without access to the skills that make it attainable. By the same token, those skills are of little use if arbitrary policies exclude the person who has them because of race or other distinction.

Similarly, an "open" society is one of open choices—and one in which the individual has the mobility to take advantage of those choices.

In speaking of "desegregation" or "integration," we often lose sight of what these mean within the context of a free, open, pluralistic society. We cannot be free, and at the same time be required to fit our lives into prescribed places on a racial grid—whether segregated or integrated, and whether by some mathematical formula or by automatic assignment. Neither can we be free, and at the same time be denied—because of race—the right to associate with our fellow-citizens on a basis of human equality.

An open society does not have to be homogeneous, or even fully integrated. There is room within it for many communities. Especially in a nation like America, it is natural that people with a common heritage retain special ties; it is natural and right that we have Italian or Irish or Negro or Norwegian neighborhoods; it is natural and right that members of those communities feel a sense of group identity and group pride. In terms of an open society, what matters is mobility: the right and the ability of each person to decide for himself where and how he wants to live, whether as part of the ethnic enclave or as part of the larger society—or, as many do, share the life of both.

We are richer for our cultural diversity; mobility is what allows us to enjoy it.

Economic, educational, social mobility—all these, too, are essential elements of the open society. When we speak of equal opportunity we mean just that: that each person should have an equal chance at the starting line, and an equal chance to go just as high and as far as his talents and energies will take him.

This Administration's programs for helping the poor, for equal opportunity, for expanded opportunity, all have taken a significantly changed direction from those of previous years—and those principles of a free and open society are the keys to the new direction.

Instead of making a man's decisions for him, we aim to give him both the right and ability to choose for himself—and the mobility to move upward. Instead of creating a permanent welfare class catered to by a permanent welfare bureaucracy, for example, my welfare reform proposal provides job training and a job requirement for all those able to work—and also a regular Family Assistance payment instead of the demeaning welfare handout.

By pressing hard for the "Philadelphia Plan," we have sought to crack the color bar in the construction unions—and thus to give black and other minority Americans both the right and the ability to choose jobs in the construction trades, among the highest paid in the nation.

We have inaugurated new Minority Business Enterprise programs—not only to help minority members get started in business themselves, but also, by developing more black and brown entrepreneurs, to demonstrate to young blacks, Mexican-Americans and others that they, too, can aspire to this same sort of upward economic mobility.

In our education programs, we have stressed the need for far greater diversity in offerings to match the diversity of individual needs—including more and better vocational and technical training, and a greater development of 2-year community colleges.

Such approaches have been based essentially on faith in the individual—knowing that he sometimes needs help, but believing that in the long run he usually knows what is best for himself. Through them also runs a belief that education is the key that opens the door to personal progress.

As we strive to make our schools places of equal educational opportunity, we should keep our eye fixed on this goal: To achieve a set of conditions in which neither the laws nor the institutions supported by law any longer draw an invidious distinction based on race; and going one step further, we must seek to repair the human damage wrought by past segregation. We must give the minority child, that equal place at the starting line that his parents were denied—and the pride, the dignity, the self-respect, that are the birthright of a free American.

We can do no less and still be true to our conscience and our Constitution. I believe that most Americans today, whether North or South, accept this as their duty.

The issues involved in desegregating schools, reducing racial isolation and providing equal educational opportunity are not simple. Many of the questions are profound, the factors complex, the legitimate considerations in conflict, and the answers elusive. Our continuing search, therefore, must be not for the perfect set of answers, but for the most nearly perfect and the most constructive.

I am aware that there are many sincere Americans who believe deeply in instant solutions and who will say that my approach does not go far enough fast enough. They feel that the only way to bring about social justice is to integrate all schools now, everywhere, no matter what the cost in the disruption of education.

I am aware, too, that there are many equally sincere citizens—North and South, black and white—who believe that racial separation is right, and wish the clock of progress would stop or be turned back to 1953. They will be disappointed, too.

But the call for equal educational opportunity today is in the American tradition. From the outset of the nation, one of the great struggles in America has been to transform the system of education into one that truly provided equal opportunity for all. At first, the focus was on economic discrimination. The system of "free schools" and "pauper schools" persisted well into the 19th century.

Heated debates preceded the establishment of universal free public education—and even in such States as New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, the system is barely a century old.

Even today, inequities persist. Children in poor areas often are served by poor schools—and unlike the children of the wealthy, they cannot escape to private schools. But we have been narrowing the gap—providing more and better education in more of the public schools, and making higher education more widely available through free tuition, scholarships and loans.

In other areas, too, there were long struggles to eliminate discrimination that had nothing to do with race. Property and even religious qualifications for voting persisted well into the 19th century—and not until 1920 were women finally guaranteed the right to vote.

Now the focus is on race—and on the dismantling of all racial bars to equality of opportunity in the schools. As with the lowering of economic barriers, the pull of conscience and the pull of national self-interest both are in the same direction. A system that leaves any segment of its people poorly educated serves the nation badly; a system that educates all of its people well serves the nation well.

We have overcome many problems in our 190 years as a nation. We can overcome this problem. We have managed to extend opportunity in other areas. We can extend it in this area. Just as other rights have been secured, so too can these rights be secured—and once again the nation will be better for having done so.

I am confident that we can preserve and improve our schools, carry out the mandate of our Constitution, and be true to our national conscience.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS OF SENATORS AS IN LEGISLATIVE SESSION

STATUS OF LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on February 5, I reported to the Senate on actions taken by the bipartisan leadership of both the House and Senate to expedite legislative proposals deemed necessary before Congress could adjourn sine die.

At that time, I outlined goals as being early submission of the President's budget to Congress, an identification of new authorizations necessary for enactment prior to appropriations action, and an early submission of messages and legislative proposals on those authorization bills.

The leadership had been assured by chairman of the legislative committees that early hearings on those proposals would be scheduled and the measures brought to the floor of the Senate in a timely manner so as not to delay the appropriations process.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives, Mr. MAHON, announced on March 17 a schedule for reporting and floor consideration of all appropriations bills. If this schedule can be met, it is entirely feasible to reach an early adjournment this year.

For the information of the Senate, at the end of my remarks, I will place in the RECORD a table outlining the status of recommended 1971 budget items which require additional authorizing legislation.

It should be noted that some laws have been enacted; some acts are awaiting the President's signature; some measures have passed the Senate and are awaiting House action; others are on the Senate Calendar and will be acted on soon—in fact, one is the pending business; and others are under active consideration in the appropriate legislative committees.

However, it should also be noted, Mr. President, that in at least five cases, legislative proposals have not yet been forwarded by the Executive. In order that Congress may act in a timely and thorough manner, it is necessary that these proposals be received at the earliest possible time.

I ask unanimous consent that appropriate tables be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARYLAND DAY—1970

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the distinguished Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), who is necessarily absent today, relating to Maryland Day, 1970.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MATHIAS

Mr. President, during the past week, we in Maryland passed a significant milestone. On March 25th we commemorated the 336th anniversary of the founding of Maryland, the day that the first settlers arrived at St. Clement's Island at the end of their journey from England. Maryland is older than any other northern State save only Massachusetts. Marylanders share a history of the continuous exercise of the right of self-determination, of representative government, of freedom of religion and of many of the principles which today are considered keystones to the operation of a modern social and political system. We can very truly be proud of the tradition and of the heritage which we have been given by the early settlers who on March 25, 1634 first set foot in Maryland with the object of making it a good place to live.

But there is a high tax on this pride of pedigree. It is a tax that I think everyone of us should be happy to pay because it is a tax which merely demands that we do in our time and in our generation the very best that we can to equal and, if possible, to improve the quality of life that we have inherited. This means that Marylanders today have a high standard to match in meeting the kind of effort and the kind of principle which was established for our benefit 335 years ago. We have, I think, a tremendous record of progress. Maryland has grown from an original population of about 250 settlers to a State of more than four million, larger than many of the sovereign nations of the earth. We have wealth and technology and a variety of landscape and seascape.

We have the material ability to contribute to life on this planet, and we must have a correlative, a parallel desire, to use this bounty for the benefit of all mankind. Moreover, I think we must develop a great respect for the resources that were used first by the settlers who came to Maryland on the Ark and the Dove, and we must preserve the Chesapeake Bay as well as the mountains of Western Maryland from pollution and from despoilment. So, I think it's appropriate that on this Maryland Day of 1970, during the week in which we celebrate the anniversary of the settling of our State, that we remember the prayer which was offered on behalf of Maryland by the Very Reverend Francis Sayre, Dean of the National Cathedral in Washington:

"Blow, Lord, Thy clean winds upon the shores and shoals of Maryland.

Blow gentle breeze of blessing across the earth, atop her stalwart hills, and over the greening fields.

Blow, Holy Spirit, the freshness of liberty through the hearts of Thy people whose domain named for a queen, yet worships the King who is the Father of us all.

So may Thy children catch upon their hopes the breath of glory which Thou doth send to fill the spangled sky, the lofty sails of ships, and faithful lives of men.

Fulfill then, O God, the promise once borne upon the wings of a dove of a land of peace and companionship, and encourage enough ever to follow after Thee; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

HOW TO DEAL WITH STUDENT UNREST

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the warden of Wadham College, Oxford, developed an original method of dealing with student unrest.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Warden and Fellows of Wadham College, Oxford, in a letter to a group of students who had presented a list of non-negotiable demands:

Dear Gentlemen: We note your threat to take what you call "direct action" unless your demands are immediately met. We feel that it is only sporting to let you know that our governing body includes three experts in chemical warfare, two ex-commandos skilled with dynamite and torturing prisoners, four qualified marksmen in both small arms and rifles, two ex-artillerymen, one holder of the Victoria Cross, four karate experts, and a chaplain. The governing body has authorized me to tell you that we look forward with confidence to what you call a "confrontation," and I may say even with anticipation.

RECORDING INDUSTRY'S CULTURAL AWARD TO WILLIS CONOVER

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, in these days of cynical pragmatism and pretentious expressions, rarely are we privileged to hear or read a truly moving statement. I heard such a statement on March 18, 1970.

It was elegant in its clarity and simplicity.

It was inspirational in its honesty and frankness.

It was admirable in its quiet and humble delivery.

It is truly rare and unforgettable.

It was the acceptance statement of Willis Conover of the Voice of America's "Music USA" on the Recording Industry Association's Cultural Award to him.

I have had much to do with the Voice of America and with the U.S. Information Agency, and nothing of their programs has impressed me as much as Mr. Conover's message. The American people are truly fortunate to have this man projecting not only our music but also our image to the people of the world.

I had never met Mr. Conover prior to hearing his message. But it was clearly evident that here was a rare person—a truly wise man in a world of too many "wise guys."

One of the greatest needs of our Nation today is more of his rare type to offset the "jet set" types and the "burn baby burn" types.

I envy and admire him. I only wish that I were capable of achieving such a message in such a manner as he did in his acceptance of the Cultural Award.

The Voice of America should have a prominent and repeated place for the Conover message.

One of the member companies of the Recording Industry Association should record the great value of the Conover message and acceptance statement and make a record of it in a manner similar to the Dirksen recordings.

It is too inspirational and reassuring not to be shared. For that reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, for you cannot help catching its spirit when you read it.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY WILLIS CONOVER OF VOICE OF AMERICA

When we were kids, we took for granted that the world we knew was the world everyone knew. People had different names and different faces, but if our home was happy (or if it was unhappy) we assumed that was the way all other homes were. Remember? If we were Protestants, or Catholics, or Jews, we joined our gang in teasing or fighting kids of other faiths for being "different", but it didn't occur to us that the services in those other churches might be very different from what we knew. We would have howled at anyone who told us that in the Southern Hemisphere it's winter in June and summer in January.

We held on to whatever beliefs we could grasp in the chaos, wrong beliefs and right ones, because that was all we had, then, and —really, it seemed—all we ever would have: We would never become adults because adults were "grownups" and we were "kids" and how could you change that?

Then we approached the door into the adult world. And every door was different. Some of us were good talkers, and maybe a dedicated teacher urged us to go into the Debating Society, and we found we could convince and influence. We went through the door and became salesmen if money was what we wanted, or politicians if we wanted to change the way the world was run.

Some of us wrote poems, or drew copies of comic strip characters, or sang in an amateur show, and were praised by Mommy and Daddy (or weren't praised, which could be even more decisive) and found ourselves artists on the other side of the door. When I was fourteen I played the part of a radio announcer in a high school play, and afterwards everyone said, "You sounded just like a real radio announcer!", and I knew then exactly which door I was going to go through.

Well, things on this side of the door aren't always what we thought they'd be. But here we all are tonight: salesmen and executives, Congressmen and Senators and other government officials, and artists. (I am none of these unfortunately. The things I do are a step or two away from all of them.) It would appear that we are all different from each other. And of course we are. But there is one simple kind of difference that, paradoxically, unites us all. A congressman friend of mine once told me: "There are two kinds of congressmen: The kind who work to get in the headlines and the kind who work to accomplish something for their country." Some times, of course, the two overlap.

There are two kinds of performers. Those who want to be instant celebrities—famous because they're famous, guests on TV talk shows, names in the gossip columns, and best tables in night clubs—and those who are proud not of "who they are" but of what they do and how they do it.

Two kinds of salesmen, in the entertainment industries: those who push performers who want a paper-fire success, a big fast blaze and then out, and those who help the artists achieve a steady, enduring glow. In my own field, lacking (as I said) those other talents, I was forced by the circumstances to settle on a sort of secondary talent, that of editor, or interpreter, or sometimes catalyst. I believe I saw a difference here, too. The headline stuff, the quick spotlight, the fast buck never appealed to me. I'm simply unable to be one of the "Now" people: no past, no future, just the quantum jump into Now—and a closet full of last year's Nehru jackets.

But "It's what's happenin', baby"? Comic books and sex magazines outsell Saturday Review, Atlantic Monthly, and Harper's; but I'm not going to throw Shakespeare out of my library (either William or Frank) for Batman. Andy Warhol is what's happening; in my gallery, I hang Warhol only in effigy. Drugs are what's happening; crime is what's happening; rudeness; shoddy workmanship; pollution; noise. Adults are trying to imitate children. Whites are trying to imitate blacks. Officers are being Good Guys with enlisted men. And they're all being laughed at behind their backs.

Okay, so the flashy headline and the Now stuff makes a buck. And we need that too.

But when I talk about America to people overseas, when I broadcast American music, when I encourage performers, my subject is the thing you've done that you're most proud of. Whether or not it made the papers or the charts. Your unadvertised good works are what I advertise.

And so we share that difference. You can honor me this evening only because of the honorable things you do. I can't exist without them.

ELECTRIC POWER AND THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, one example of the concern throughout the Nation for our environment has been the difficulties experienced by the electric utility industry in finding acceptable sites for their new generating plants and for transmission line rights-of-way. The Intergovernmental Power Coordination and Environmental Protection Act (S. 7242), which I introduced and which has been the subject of hearings in Washington, D.C. and in the field, would provide a rational means to resolve the conflict between two significant national objectives: adequate electric energy to meet the Nation's demands and the protection of the environment.

We cannot permit this problem to go unattended and unresolved. The likelihood of "brown-outs" this coming summer, similar to those experienced last summer and even during the periods of peak demand for electric energy during the winter, makes it evident that this problem cannot be ignored without risking drastic consequences.

The New York Times of Sunday, March 1, contained a perceptive article by Mr. Gene Smith entitled "Utilities Damned at Any Location." Mr. Smith has summed up the dilemma in a very few paragraphs. I ask unanimous consent that his article be printed in the RECORD in order that his analysis may be read by those concerned about this situation.

In his article, Mr. Smith refers to a speech made by Lee C. White, the former Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, setting forth a number of specific suggestions to be considered by utility executives in undertaking to meet this challenge. An editorial from Electrical World for February 23, 1970, a publication widely read in the electric utility industry, comments favorably on Mr. White's suggestions and commends them to the attention of utility executives throughout the country. I, too, believe that Mr. White's suggestions are worthy of examination and ask unanimous consent that the text of his speech, which contained the nine-point proposal, and the editorial from Electrical World also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UTILITIES DAMNED AT ANY LOCATION

(By Gene Smith)

Like frustrated apartment seekers, electric utilities are having trouble these days finding a place to live.

Or, as the January issue of Resources, the Magazine Inc., headlined a recent article: "Power—Yes; Power Plants—No."

The utilities have reached the point where they seemingly have no place to turn. Power demand doubles at a rate slightly faster than every 10 years but utilities are opposed by certain groups if they try to situate plants in cities, by others if they seek sites in the suburbs or wilderness areas and by still others if they try to locate near vital water supplies.

Several developments of recent weeks point up the problems of finding sites for power plants, whether nuclear, fossil-fueled (coal, oil or gas) or hydro:

The New York City Council has before it a proposed law regarding nuclear reactors. It reads in part: "No person, corporation, association, institution, college or university shall conduct an industry, occupation, business, profession, training program, demonstration or experiment, educational or otherwise, requiring the use of a nuclear reactor in the city."

Northeast Utilities announced last Wednesday that it might build a giant pumped-storage power plant at one of two sites in the Lower Berkshires on either side of the Connecticut-Massachusetts border. The utility asked governmental and citizens groups to participate in feasibility studies. Conservationists immediately indicated their opposition to any plants in the area.

Speakers at a recent briefing on a national energy policy suggested that maybe the time had come for electric utilities to slow down on their salesmanship "at least until we can catch up and develop power-supply technology that will minimize environmental concerns."

Federal Governmental officials have urged the creation of regional or national regulatory groups to pass on potential power-plant sites, and several states have already established such bodies with varying degrees of power.

Congressional leaders have called for a moratorium on all nuclear-plant construction, while the California Environmental Quality Study Council wants to give top priority to nuclear plants to eliminate future air pollution.

Obviously, the solution lies somewhere between these extremes, and the more progressive utility leaders recognize this. Lelan F. Sillin Jr., president and chief executive officer of Northeast Utilities, explained last week that he would use the same approach for future nuclear and fossil-fueled plants that he unveiled last Wednesday at Salisbury, Conn. He described it as an "open-planning concept" and acknowledged that it had such drawbacks as the possibility of escalating land values by disclosing well in advance exact sites for power projects.

Mr. Sillin said it was "quite apparent that we've got to improve the process for siting (power plants)." He added that in the past the lowest possible cost, which included straight-line routing of high voltage power lines, was the chief criterior.

"This is a step beyond the unilateral decision," he went on. "We are seeking a truly cooperate approach . . . one that will avoid the 'climate of crisis.'

"It sort of seems to me that we've lost the art of communications. We intend to bend over backwards to establish a quality of credibility and hope we can do it this way rather than in a climate of polarized views." Mr. Sillin added.

The New York State Atomic and Space Development Authority expects to spend most of its time during the next 15 months finding sites for future nuclear-power plants. Under the state's electric-power program, the Authority is authorized to select and acquire sites and to make them available as needed to electric-power generating organizations through leases or other contractual agreements.

CONSIDERATION INVOLVED

James G. Cline, general manager, indicated that the key criteria would take into consideration thermal effects, nuclear safeguards, power growth and grid needs, esthetics and actual land usage, including how best to integrate facilities into the environment.

He explained his group realized that there were "certain places where power plants belong, just as there are certain places where they don't belong." He emphasized that all alternative sites would be considered in the process of eliminating for the best locations.

Governor Rockefeller has proposed additional legislation aimed at establishing "a procedure for resolving questions relating to the location of major utility facilities without undue delay."

LUCE URGES REVISION

Charles F. Luce, chairman and chief executive officer of the Consolidated Edison Company, has called for a complete revision of state laws on the licensing of power plants and transmission lines. He has repeatedly urged the creation of one single regulatory agency that would make engineering, economic and environment decisions in consultation with state and local agencies interested in the outcome of licensing procedures.

Maryland has threatened a moratorium on nuclear plants if the Federal Government doesn't institute a crash program to study potential hazards.

Oregon and Washington have established advisory and coordinating committees aimed at the control of power-plant sites.

Senator Edmund S. Muskie, Democrat of Maine, has introduced a bill that calls for resolving power-plant siting on a regional level and providing a means for coordinating Federal, state and local group responsibilities for all the maintenance of reliable power supplies. Mr. Luce indicated he felt this would only add another level of regulation to the already over-crowded procedures.

Lee C. White, former chairman of the Federal Power Commission, recently outlined a nine-point plan for utilities faced with growing environmental problems. Chief among his points were:

Break away from the traditional approach of keeping long-range plans supersecret.

Give the earliest possible advice on plans to all state and local agencies that might have a hand in planning.

Consider for nomination to boards of directors persons identified with the conservation movement.

Name a company official responsible for environmental matters.

"Come very quickly to grips with the environmental crisis that faces you . . . The question is getting a little more attention in Congress these days, but I do not believe that, if I were managing a utility, I would wait for that particular salvation," Mr. White concluded.

REMARKS BY LEE C. WHITE, SEMER, WHITE & JACOBSEN, BEFORE THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE MISSOURI BASIN SYSTEMS GROUP, DENVER, COLO., FEBRUARY 4, 1970

Every competent, or even semi-competent, speech writer has an all purpose speech entitled "The ——— Industry is at the Crossroads." Today the electric utilities industry—and that term includes every segment of the industry—is truly facing a future unrecognizable in terms of the past and even the present. I am not as close today as I was 6 months ago to the specifics of the problems facing the industry, and I can't even claim that my remoteness has necessarily given me new breadth or better perspective, but this has never deterred me in the past from expressing my views; and, having come this far, it is difficult for me to conceive of any force that could prevent me from expressing them now.

Not necessarily in the order of importance, I see the following problem areas and would like to discuss each of them in turn: financing and rates; the need for greater coordinated planning and operations; the commitment to nuclear energy; the need for greater research efforts; and the environmental crisis.

Financing and Rates.—The electric utility industry, which is already the nation's number one industry in capital investment, at somewhere near $100 billion, is estimated to require an additional capital investment of $350 billion by 1990, and this is occurring at a time when interest rates on utility bonds are between 8½ and 9 percent. An industry that prided itself on the fact that while the cost of living was rising steadily, rates for electricity were relatively constant and, if anything, had experienced a decline, is apparently moving into an era of sharply rising rates. I am no longer faced with the problem of determining what rates should be allowed, but I have considerable sympathy for those who must. The nation's regulatory bodies are now staring at hundreds of millions of dollars in proposed rate increases. Their obligation—to fix fair rates which will enable the utilities to secure the necessary funds to finance their required expansion and yet at the lowest cost to the consumer consistent with that requirement—is indeed a monumental assignment, and especially difficult will it be to perform the task reasonably and without undue delay. I hope that the individual states will provide adequate funds for staffing their regulatory bodies and that they will attract to those commissions men of vision, experience, and competence to protect the public interest. At this point, let me indicate my enthusiastic support for the action of Governor Rockefeller of New York in designating my predecessor at the Federal Power Commission to be Chairman of the New York Public Service Commission—simultaneously I should express my great pleasure that Mr. Swidler accepted the assignment. As opportunities to fill their important positions occur, I hope the appointing authorities will find the best possible candidates, especially at this time when the responsibilities are greater than ever before and where the tasks are probably more difficult than ever before.

An even more complicated aspect of rate making has begun to atract attention, and this is the structuring of rates. It has been suggested that rates should be tailored to assist the economically disadvantaged, not only because of their need to have vital utilities service, but perhaps because they are bearing an inordinate share of the rate burden, in that a greater investment in facilities is required to serve suburban areas than the more densely settled inner city. It also has been noted recently that, if we are approaching a period in our national life when there will not be sufficient energy to meet all demands, it may make sense to conserve energy by reversing the normal pattern and charging higher rates for that amount of energy used over the minimum required for the most esssential services. This is not the time and place to discuss these problems in detail—and, frankly, I don't know what the answers are, but suffice it to say that this is the type of issue that must be identified and resolved by those with regulatory responsibilities.

The Need for Greater Coordinated Planning and Operations.—Improved coordination in planning and operations by electric utilities is just about universally accepted as a laudable objective; but, quite candidly, we have had a little difficulty in getting from here to there. In some sections of the country, for example the Pacific Northwest, considerable progress has been made toward this end. Elsewhere, problems such as the tensions that have existed between different forms of ownership have impeded efforts to achieve that level of cooperation that is essential to a nation that is heavily dependent upon electric energy. In my view, one of the outstanding contributions of the Federal Power Commission during the 1960's was to get the various segments of the electric utility industry to focus on their common needs and problems and to put aside the natural rivalries and tensions that have existed between the different forms of ownership through the decades. Unfortunately, this has not been uniform throughout the country. As you know better than I, in the upper Midwest there have been some severe problems in achieving the accord and understanding that is essential to the mutual strength of all of the systems serving all of the people of the area. Electrons do not run around wearing little tags saying "produced by investor-owned utility" or "produced by a cooperatively-owned utility" or "produced by a municipally-owned system." While serving in the government I recommended legislation which would have required regional coordinating councils and authorized the FPC to approve the method of operating them. This recommendation was made with full recognition of the fact that it is difficult to legislate cooperation. I hope the fact Congress has not acted on that recommendation will not encourage utilities to hang back, but rather will serve as a prod to achieving the required level of coordination on a voluntary basis. I hope, too, that the developing regional councils will respond affirmatively to the FPC's very courteous "request" in its revised order on voluntary interconnection and coordination by power systems to permit participation by FPC and state regulatory commission staff on a non-voting basis "in their principal meetings, and upon occasion, as may be requested by the Commission's Chief, Bureau of Power, in important technical meetings."

I do not hold to the view expressed by some that the inevitable solution to the bulk power supply problem is the establishment of only 12 or 15 bulk supply corporations operating in the United States. This is certainly an approach, but there are other appropriate and legitimate methods, and none is more promising than true regional coordination.

The Commitment to Nuclear Energy.—There is, of course, something stimulating about people in a technical industry operating in the outer reaches of technology. Undoubtedly, some electric utilities have committed themselves to nuclear energy plants only for the prestige associated with the new technology. Those whose operations and locations (that is nearness to conventional fossil fuels) permit have apparently hedged their bets by ordering conventional facilities at the same time they are sticking their toes in the nuclear bathtub. The remarkable delays in getting nuclear units on the line (particularly the very large units); the increase in cost per installed kilowatt of capacity over the quoted prices of only a few years ago; the continuing concern about both thermal pollution and potential radioactive emissions have all conspired to slow down the pellmell rush for nuclear contracts that existed in 1967 and 1968. Recent announcements of new contracts indicate that there has been a slight quickening of the pace that nuclear is creeping back up from a very difficult 1969. The Atomic Industrial Forum predicted last week that there would be a 50 percent increase in nuclear plant orders in 1970 over 1969. I do not advocate the barring of nuclear plants or a slowdown by the industry in the purchasing of such plants, but certainly any utility management has the greatest obligation to satisfy itself that the decision to go nuclear not be made without the most exhaustive assessment of both the benefits and the disadvantages of such a course.

The Need for Greater Research Efforts.—It has become standard fare for the people in government to criticize the electric utility industry for the relatively meager contribution it has made in research and development. In my view, the reason is quite evident: Simply stated, the criticism is valid.

The FPC recently released its compilation of Statistics for Privately Owned Electric Utilities in the United States for 1968. It reveals that the approximately 200 investor-owned utilities spent less than $39 million, or about 2/10 of 1 percent of revenues, on research and development in 1968 either directly by the utility or in support of outside organizations. In the same year, expenses for advertising and other sales expenses were over $273 million. I do not have comparable figures for the municipally and cooperatively-owned systems, but I doubt that they would look much better.

The unwillingness of the industry to finance an experimental magneto hydrodynamics (MHD) plant is, in my view, inexcusable. It has always mystified me that, as important and as financially strong as the electric utility industry is, it had left so much of the research and development to the manufacturers of electrical equipment. Basic human behavior would suggest that the organization performing the research will resolve any differences or questions of emphasis in favor of its own needs, not someone else's. The Federal Power Commission has sought to encourage research by utilities; its most recent action being a rule proposed last week which would permit expenditures for research not only to be an operating expense, but a part of the utility's rate base. Although the objective is certainly commendable, I personally have a little trouble with the concept of including the research and development expenses as part of the rate base. However, I am confident the matter will be thoroughly argued before the Commission before it reaches a decision on the question.

The point, rather simply, is that the consuming public has the right to expect a greater research effort by the industry, especially in the light of the environment problems it faces.

The Environmental Crisis.—Undeniably, the major problem facing electric utilities throughout the country is the sharply increased concern about the environment. This problem, which manifested itself a few years ago in sporadic outbursts, has now risen to the point where it is designated by President Nixon as perhaps the most important domestic problem facing the nation.

Although a whole host of us lesser lights may get a litle charge out of digging copies of our own brilliant analyses of these problems out of our files and can point with pride to our vision of years ago, the significant factor is that today there is legitimate and vigorous competition among our top political leaders for preeminence in the field of preserving and protecting our environment. This, as I see it, is all to the good.

What it means, however, is that the problems associated with selecting generating sites and transmission line rights of way constitute one very prominent, visible, and definable chunk of the total environmental problem. Because of its character, this particular chunk will certainly continue to have a great deal of attention focused on it.

Prior to leaving the Federal Power Commission, I predicted that within 2 years—that is by May 1971—the utility industry would be asking Washington for assistance to help it cut through the growing stalemate between those who have the responsibility to meet the steadily increasing power needs of the nation and those who are deeply concerned about the impact of such industrial growth on the environment. I have a hunch that that particular prediction will prove to be a little better than the political predictions I have been making during the past few years.

In any event, it is worth noting that Mr. Charles Luce, Chairman of the Board of the Consolidated Edison Company of New York, in a speech to the Association of the Bar of the City of New York a couple of months ago, expressed the view that the State of New York should adopt legislation vesting in one state agency the authority to cut through the complex of issues that is preventing Con Ed from constructing the facilities necessary to meet its projected load growth. I do not know that I favor individual state legislation, but certainly the situation cannot continue as it has without a very severe danger that we will find ourselves without adequate power.

It is perfectly evident that the dialogue between the environmentalists and utilities is beginning to shift. The utilities are no longer being asked, "why don't you locate your plant in a site other than the one that you have selected?" The question being asked today is, "can you justify the construction of an additional plant anywhere?" In short, the public is beginning to challenge the basic assumption upon which the electric utilities have operated in the past 85 years, namely, that not only must the utility meet every request for power, but it was appropriate and desirable for it to promote increased consumption of electric energy. Today there are a very few voices in the wilderness questioning this basis precept. Tomorrow there will be additional voices, and the day after that, a veritable chorus.

Realistically, we will continue to increase our consumption of electricity in the United States, and those of you who bear the responsibility for seeing to it that there is an adequate supply must, in my view, very quickly come to grips with the environmental crisis that faces you. The problems generally are more intense in the congested areas along the eastern and western seacoasts; but, if the problem has not come to your system yet, you can take bets on its doing so and you can also predict that it will come faster than perhaps you wanted it to. The point is that time is exceedingly short, and I would strongly encourage each of the systems, individually and on a joint basis, to analyze these problems and begin to provide workable solutions.

Let me offer for your consideration, in a very sketchy way, some approaches that occur to me to hold some hope. As I have indicated, I would tread the legislative path. The question is getting a little bit more attention in Congress these days, but I do not believe that, if I were managing a utility, I would wait for that particular salvation. I offer you the following suggestions:

1. Break away from the traditional approach of keeping long-range plans for construction of generating and transmission facilities super secret—even though controversy will be engendered by revealing them, recent experience indicates there is just as much controversy if you reveal your plans the day before construction is to commence.

2. Recognize the legitimacy of the people's concern for and interest in our environment—certainly there are some environmentalists and conservationists who are so extreme in their positions that accommodation with those positions is impossible, but that is not to suggest that the great bulk of concerned people do not appreciate the need to develop acceptable accommodations between the need for power and the negative environmental by-products.

3. Encourage the various societies, associations, and organizations in your service area who are concerned with environmental matters to come together in a voluntary grouping so that your engineers and design people can work with them on an early and constructive basis—you may even find their contribution to be helpful and they may afford protection against spontaneous and less qualified critics.

4. Provide formal recognition of your concern for the environment by designating an assistant manager or a vice president for environmental matters—this not only will indicate organization concern, but will serve to channel injuries and advice to the appropriate office.

5. Additional recognition can come through appointment to your Board of Directors of local or national personalities identified with the conservation movement—their knowledge, understanding and familiarity with issues and people can be a positive force in the decision-making process.

6. Develop working relationships with those elements of universities in your service area devoted to environmental matters—where such disciplines are already established, you can use the benefits of their research and knowledge of local factors, and where they do not exist or are weak, try to help them achieve the capability of providing the soundest analytical foundation for decision-makers.

7. Give the earliest possible advice on system plans to all appropriate state and local agencies, including zoning authorities, pollution abatement agencies, regulatory bodies, aesthetic, historical, and scenic preservation agencies, as well as governors, mayors, county commissioners and other elected officials—they will increasingly feel the intense interest (and even heat) from the public and are entitled to be fully and promptly informed.

8. Examine your research budgets to see whether a greater effort is possible, particularly in such environment-protecting fields as more economical undergrounding of transmission lines, treatment of fuels before use, removal of pollutants after combustion—technological progress got us into some of these difficult environmental problems; we should be able to use some of our creativity and ingenuity to resolve those problems.

9. Publicize in every legitimate way actions taken by your system that demonstrate your sensitivity to the environmental problems—to the extent the electric utility industry intensifies its efforts to meet these challenges and so advises the consuming public, it will receive improved understanding and acceptance.

Conclusion.—Earlier I referred to the rivalries and tensions that have continued to exist between the various segments of the electric utility industry. In a very real sense I can see some progress being made in improved cooperation between the segments of the industry—I only wish that it were uniformly good across the country. It occurs to me, however, that one highly legitimate form of competition between the consumer-owned segments of the industry and the investor-owned utilities might be a contest to see which major group can first develop the means of responding to the nation's heightened interest in the environment and indeed some of the other problems that have been discussed today. The temptation to an old government employee such as myself to preach is very nearly irresistible. Thus, I would like to conclude with one observation that will be at least controversial and probably offensive: Utilities that are owned by their customers tend to believe that their hearts and their deeds must, because of that fact, be pure—may I respectfully suggest that this is not necessarily true. As managers with the responsibility to meet all the legitimate needs of your customers who also happen to own your systems, you have a special duty and opportunity to provide leadership for the great industry of which you are a significant part.

NINE SUGGESTIONS FROM AN OLD PRO

Rarely less than forthright in speaking his mind on utility industry issues when he was chairman of the Federal Power Commission, Lee C. White appears no less candid in his present role as private citizen. We found real wisdom in nine suggestions he offered utility management earlier this month for coping with the environmental crisis, in an address before a utility group in Denver. These were his suggestions:

1. Break away from the traditional approach of keeping long-rang plans for construction of generating and transmission facilities supersecret—even though controversy will be engendered by revealing them. There is just as much controversy if you reveal them the day before construction begins.

2. Recognize the legitimacy of the people's concern for and interest in our environment. Certainly some environmentalists are extreme in their positions, but the great bulk of concerned people appreciate the need to develop acceptable accommodations between the need for power and the negative environmental byproducts.

3. Encourage the various societies, associations, and organizations in your service area who are concerned with environmental matters to come together in a voluntary grouping so that your engineers and design people can work with them on an early and constructive basis.

4. Provide formal recognition of your concern for the environment by designating an assistant manager or vice president for environmental matters. This will indicate organizational concern, and channel inquiries and advice to the appropriate office.

5. Additional recognition can come through appointment to your board of directors of local or national personalities identified with the conservation movement. Their knowledge, understanding, and familiarity with issues and people can be a positive force in the decision-making process.

6. Develop working relationships with those elements of universities in your area devoted to environmental matters. Where such disciplines are already established you can use the benefits of their research—and where they are weak try to help them achieve capability.

7. Give the earliest possible advice on system plans to all appropriate state and local agencies, including zoning authorities, pollution-abatement agencies, regulatory bodies, and aesthetic, historical, and scenic-preservation agencies, as well as governors, mayors, and county commissioners. They feel the intense interest (even heat) from the public, and are entitled to be fully and promptly informed.

8. Examine your research budgets to see whether a greater effort is possible, particularly in such environment-protecting fields as more economical undergrounding of transmission lines, treatment of fuels before use, removal of pollutants after combustion. Technological progress got us into some of these difficult environmental problems; we should be able to use some of our creativity and ingenuity to resolve them.

9. Publicize in every legitimate way actions that demonstrate your sensitivity to environmental problems. To the extent that the electric utility industry intensifies its efforts to meet these challenges and so advises the consuming public, it will receive improved understanding and acceptance.

For those who must bear the responsibility for seeing to it that there is an adequate supply of electricity in the United States, White had one more bit of advice:

"Come very quickly to grips with the environmental crisis that faces you . . . The question is getting a little more attention in Congress these days, but I do not believe that, if I were managing a utility, I would wait for that particular salvation."

This is very sound counsel.

MICHIGAN MARINE WINS NAVY CROSS

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, today I received word from the Department of the Navy that the Nation's second highest award for valor, the Navy Cross, will be presented to a young Marine from Michigan.

He is Pfc. Timothy S. Guarino, son of Mr. and Mrs. Tony Guarino, of 311 Richter Street, River Rouge, Mich.

I have been informed that Timothy Guarino, now returned to civilian life, will be decorated with the Navy Cross at appropriate ceremonies early next month in his hometown.

I ask unanimous consent that the citation which will accompany the award be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D.C.

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to Private First Class Timothy S. Guarino, United States Marine Corps for service as set forth in the following

CITATION

For extraordinary heroism while serving as a Machine Gun Ammunition Man with Company G, Second Battalion, Ninth Marines, Third Marine Division in the Republic of Vietnam on 1 June 1969. Company G came under a vicious ground attack by a determined hostile force utilized satchel charges, automatic weapons fire and rocket-propelled grenades. While resolutely defending his position in a sector of the perimeter which had been penetrated by the enemy, Private First Class Guarino observed a wounded companion fall in a position dangerously exposed to the enemy advance. Completely disregarding his own safety, he fearlessly crossed the fire-swept area and carried his injured comrade to a place where medical aid was available. As he was assisting in treating the casualty, an enemy hand grenade landed beside the corpsman and the wounded Marine. Fully aware of the possible consequences of his actions and thinking only of the safety of his companion, Private First Class Guarino unhesitatingly knocked the corpsman to the ground beside the wounded Marine and valiantly threw himself over their bodies thus absorbing the full force of the grenade's detonation and sustaining extensive wounds. His heroic and bold efforts inspired all who observed him and saved the lives of two comrades. By his courage, selfless concern for his fellowman and unwavering devotion to duty in the face of grave personal danger Private First Class Guarino upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

For the President,
/s/ JOHN H. CHAFEE,
Secretary of the Navy.

QUESTIONS ABOUT THE PRESIDENT'S EDUCATION PROPOSALS

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the recent announcement by President Nixon relating to the Higher Education Opportunity Act of 1970 has prompted certain questions from school administrators and concerned citizens.

If the President's proposal were adopted, it appears that many of the objectives and desirable features of the national defense loan program would be killed. As I understand the President's proposal, there would no longer be any direct Federal loans and no longer would subsidies on interest for guaranteed loans be available to students.

While I would be the first to agree that we can improve our present efforts in providing an opportunity for all qualified students to pursue fully their educational desires, I have serious reservations about the President's proposal.

Mr. Elton G. Davis, director of financial aid at the University of Oklahoma, has agreed with the President's stated objective of making more loans available to students from low-income families, but has expressed concern that the President's proposal by creating more new programs may in fact end up being wasteful. Mr. Davis asked:

How can the government talk of a new program and ask support for new ideas, when they can't support the programs we have already established?

Comments made by Mr. Davis appear in the Oklahoma Journal of March 22, 1970. Since they reflect some of the questions being raised by the President's proposal, I think the column will be of interest to Senators. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OU OFFICIAL RAPS NIXON'S LOAN PLANS

(By Richard Boggs)

NORMAN.—President Nixon could help more needy students by directing educational assistance money into existing programs than by spending thousands creating new agencies, a University of Oklahoma student loan official said Saturday.

Elton G. Davis, OU director of financial aid, agreed with Nixon's recommendation to trim the fat and make loans more readily available to lower income families. But he added it would be a waste to establish new programs for this purpose.

"There is a heck of a cost involved in setting up the machinery for a loan program," said Davis.

"If he wants to set up a federal bank and spend all this money, fine. But by putting that money in established programs, a lot more kids could go to school.

"Dropping the limit from $15,000 to $10,000 would strap a lot of people," he said. "If the president wants to give those people from families of $7,500 the same chance to go to college as kids from $10,000 well and good.

"The irony is that generally the people who get our loans, some 75 per cent or more, are from families of less than $7,500 already. Some of them are as low as $3,000."

He said the maximum allowable on other federal programs, including the National Defense Loan program, is already $9,000 annual income and only $6,000 if his wife does not work and there are no children.

"As for the bank loans in which the government pays all of the interest," he said, "some families making $20,000 can qualify. The criteria is based on the adjusted gross income."

"Some families with $20,000 income, heavily in debt or with a large number of children, are not in as good of shape for dishing out college money as other families with incomes less than $10,000 per year."

"There is far more participation from banks in rural areas than in the metropolitan area," he said. "They know the people and know they will be customers when they get out."

Last year, the University of Oklahoma processed 1,432 applications for the guaranteed bank loans. Slightly more than half were approved by banks. Records showed confirmation of only 762 loans under the program.

The state Board of Regents for Higher Education showed 6,149 loans for all public and private schools in the state and for all Oklahoma students attending accredited out of state schools.

"They don't like to advertise it (the loan program) because they don't want the business," said Dr. E. T. Dunlap, the regents monitor for the program.

"In the three-year history of the programs, the regents have underwritten 13,125 loans totaling $10,270,165.51."

Asked about the Oklahoma City banks, Davis said, "They are not too strong, not too strong. That's all I can say, they are not giving the program the support they should.

"I don't blame them for wanting a profit, they're in business to make money," he said.

"I think they should do this for the people of their community. Students will remember their bankers when they get their degree."

One Oklahoma City banker said they would not take his bank off the list of institutions making such loans.

Davis said all five Norman banks had given good support to the program and set an example of civic responsibility.

"There are a lot of other communities, mostly rural, which have supported the program," he said.

He said many students who didn't really need the money to go to school had applied and in some cases been granted loans.

"Some students borrow the money under the program, let the government pay the interest while they are in school and let daddy earn interest with it," he said. "The government should cinch up a little on that. There's far too much of it.

"We figure it takes an average of $1,500 to go to OU for a year and we've been able to help every student that has applied to this office and who reflects a need whether with a loan or work or a scholarship," he said. "We try to keep the student from getting $1,000 per year loan and building a huge debt.

"First of all, we want them to come to school with money from their summer work, and if he's willing to work when he gets here, we can put him on work study," he said. In that program a student works a maximum of 15 hours per week for tuition assistance.

"If he earns $700 that way, that leaves $800 and we can get qualified students an educational opportunity grant of half that and a loan for the balance," he said. "Even if we can't get the student qualified for the grant, a loan of $800 per year is something he can live with and is much better than $1,000 or $1,500."

"How can the government talk of a new program and ask support for new ideas," Davis asked, "when they can't support the programs we have already established?"

He said most programs will face budget cutbacks in September.

"It's the third year in a row we've cut back on the National Defense loans," he said. "A lot of students will have to drop out of school, others won't get in."

THE CHICAGO BIELARUSSIAN AMERICANS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. President, we in the United States are indeed fortunate to be a nation of many peoples. Our national heritage is a tapestry woven from the riches of all of the cultures of the world.

My own State of Illinois is especially fortunate to have within her borders citizens who strive to preserve their cultural backgrounds and honor the homelands of their fathers.

Yesterday the Americans of Bielarussian descent celebrated the 52d anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of Bielarus. These fine Americans, enjoying the freedoms of this country, have not forgotten, and will not forget, the plight of their brothers enslaved behind the Iron Curtain.

Last year at this time, the Chicago Bielarussian Americans endorsed a resolution reaffirming their belief in the American democratic principles and requesting the assistance of the United States and the United Nations in assuring the return of liberty to the captive people of Bielarus.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Chicago Bielarussian Americans be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A RESOLUTION BY THE CHICAGO BIELARUSIAN AMERICANS

We, Americans of Bielarusian descent, who have gathered this 29th day of March 1969, A.D., at 6:30 p.m., at the Bielarusian Cultural Center located at 3107 West Fullerton Avenue, Chicago, Illinois, to commemorate the Fifty-first anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of Bielarus (Byelorussia), do solemnly affirm and reiterate our position of previous years as follows:

Whereas, the people of Bielarus (Bielarussia), one of the first victims of the Russian Communist aggression, which two years ago marked fifty years of existence of their imperialistic and colonial state, have been forcibly deprived of their national sovereignty, their religious, political, cultural, and economic liberty, and are still subjected to inhuman policy of oppression, terror, mass deportation, Russification, economic slavery and colonial exploitation; and

Whereas, the Bielarusian people are strongly opposed to foreign domination and are determined to restore their freedom and sovereignty which they had rightly enjoyed for many centuries in the past; and

Whereas, with the attention of the world focused on the new African and Asian nations which were liberated from colonialism with the aid of the United Nations and have joined the community of free and independent states, the plight of the Bielarusian and other non-Russian nations enslaved in the U.S.S.R. have been neglected; and

Whereas, the present government of the Bielarusian S.S.R. and its United Nations delegation, who are not democratically constituted representatives of the Bielarusian nation but only the executors of the will of the Russian colonial administration, will not and cannot, therefore, protect and defend the Bielarusian people; therefore be it

Resolved, that this Commemorative Assembly of the Fifty-First Anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of Bielarus appeal to the President, the Secretary of State, and members of the Congress of the United States of America with the request to do everything possible that the liberation of Bielarus and other countries subjugated by Communist Russia be included in the program of the American foreign policy; and be it further

Resolved, that the Government of the United States of America take appropriate steps through the United Nations and other channels to stop the Soviet Russia's policy of colonialism in Eastern Europe and force the Russians to pull out their armed forces from non-Russian lands and to institute free elections in Bielarus under the supervision of the United Nations, as it was already proposed in the resolution in the Senate of the United States by the Senator from Illinois, Everett M. Dirksen, on January 22, 1965; and be it further

Resolved, that we, Americans of Bielarusian origin and descent, reaffirm our adherence to the American democratic principles of government and pledge our support to our President and our Congress in their firm stand against the Communist aggression in Vietnam and in their efforts to achieve a lasting peace in the world, with freedom and justice; and be it further

Resolved, that the Bielarusians in the Free World, together with Americans of Bielarusian descent, are the sole and rightful spokesmen for the Bielarusian freedom cause and should be consulted in all matters regarding Bielarus; and be it further

Resolved, that the best name in English for the country of our ancestry is Bielarus and the adjective Bielarusian and that such terminology should be promoted along with the name Byelorussia, which is greatly disliked by all Bielarusian people everywhere.

BETTER CHOICES FOR NOMINATION TO THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, during the debate on the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court, I have, on numerous occasions, suggested that my opposition to the nominee is not based on the fact that he would be a "strict constructionist," but on other considerations. After a study of Judge Carswell's record and after listening to the testimony before the Committee on the Judiciary, I became convinced that Judge Carswell lacked the qualifications to sit on our Highest Court. At that time and on several subsequent occasions I said that there are numerous outstanding men and women the President might appoint who, while strict constructionists, have established records of judicial competence and professional distinction.

The current issue of Life magazine contains an article naming nine distinguished attorneys and judges who, the editors feel, would be better choices for nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court than Judge Carswell. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOES NIXON HAVE TO STAFF THE COURT WITH CARSWELLS?

Underlying the Senate's debate on the Supreme Court nomination of G. Harrold Carswell was a nagging question, is this the best the U.S. can do? Richard Nixon's choice of Carswell was by no means a casual one. Unlike his predecessors, who frequently elevated cronies to the High Court, Nixon said he considers only nominees who are personally not close to him and have previous judicial experience. He also had another unproclaimed but plain, purpose: to pick a Southern conservative. The Nixonian approach (above) apparently involves painstaking examination of the nominee's mind, health and political bona fides, and finally the cosmetic touches which produce the Compleat Associate Justice. It should work as well as any other. But has it? Even those who accept the proposition that a President has as much right to choose a "strict constructionist" as to fill a "Jewish seat" have been moved to wonder whether it ought not be possible to find someone with more positive qualities and credentials than Carswell. So LIFE asked a number of prominent judges, legal scholars and bar officials what they thought. Nine alternative candidates for the Court whom they often mentioned, or highly praised, follow:

HERE ARE NINE BETTER CANDIDATES

The jurists pictured here do not represent an attempt to make book on the particular individuals President Nixon will appoint to the Court. But most of them are the kind of people the President could feel comfortable in picking, if he widened his field of choice beyond narrowly geographic or partisan considerations. The list excludes men closely identified with Democratic administrations, such as Ramsey Clark and ex-Solicitor General Archibald Cox.

One of Nixon's criteria—that the Court needs to be balanced with appointees who are "strict constructionists"—need not disqualify all liberals. There are many judges who favor liberal social legislation and nonetheless have strong reservations about legislating by court decision.

Because they are for life, age is a question that always arises in connection with Supreme Court appointments. Some think that a man already past 60 would normally have insufficient time to make his mark on the bench. Except for James F. Byrnes, 62 when he was appointed by F.D.R. in 1941, no associate justice over 60 has been appointed to the Court since 1932. The Nixon administration is said to have made 64 its age ceiling, thus conceivably ruling out—as we have here—such respected federal judges as New York's Henry Friendly, 66, and Pennsylvania's William Hastie, 65.

All those listed are professionally active in the field of law, though no constitutional requirement or precedent says that a Supreme Court justice must be. In making future appointments (retirements from the present Court within the next few years could give him as many as three openings to fill) Nixon might look elsewhere. In the past, to solve a problem or to reward a friend, Presidents have named senators and congressmen, many of whom are lawyers.

Charles Breitel

Associate judge of the New York State Court of Appeals, 61. Outstanding on criminal law procedure. Like Chief Justice Warren Burger, a longtime prominent advocate of penal reform. Sensitive on civil liberties issues, but generally a strict conservative on the limits of court intervention. In a controversial 1961 decision, wrote that New York City could not deny American Nazi George Lincoln Rockwell his constitutional right to speak in public. A protégé of Tom Dewey. Republican.

Shirley Hufstedler

California-based circuit judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals, 44. Before taking up law practice, a teacher, a secretary and salesgirl; now the highest-ranking and most highly regarded woman judge in the federal court system. Decisions widely praised for clarity and legal craftsmanship, as well as display of sharp intellect. Democrat.

Frank Johnson, Jr.

U.S. district judge for southeastern Alabama, 51. In 14 years of courageous frontline enforcement of the Constitution, applied the 1954 school desegregation decision to the Montgomery bus system, thus helped speed desegregation in all public facilities. Presided over the trial in which an all-white jury convicted three Ku Klux Klansmen in the murder of Viola Liuzzo. Sat on the courts that abolished the Alabama poll tax, and that handed down the nation's first statewide school desegregation order, first order requiring a state to reapportion voting districts and the first court-devised reapportionment plan. Scrupulously fair, an excellent craftsman. Republican.

William Coleman, Jr.

Philadelphia lawyer, 49. Distinguished as private attorney in respected law firm, but also as a strong force in NAACP Legal Defense Fund. Member of the Eisenhower Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence and of U.S. delegation to the United Nations. Twenty-two years ago was chosen by Justice Frankfurter to be first Negro law clerk in the history of the Supreme Court. Republican.

Paul Freund

Carl M. Loeb University Professor at Harvard, 62. Quite possibly the most brilliant constitutional scholar in the country; one of Harvard Law School's most gifted teachers since Felix Frankfurter; most frequently praised—and passed over—choice for the Court throughout the past decade. Judicially, a moderate conservative: agreed, for instance, when the Warren Court ordered reapportionment, but thought it applied the doctrine too inflexibly. Politically, a New Deal Democrat.

Edward Gignoux

U.S. district judge for the State of Maine, 53. Personally outstanding for his judicial temperament, effectiveness in working with other judges, remarkable courtroom courtesy. Holder of a compassionate viewpoint soundly expressed in opinions widely admired by colleagues. Is well known far beyond Maine partly because, his in-state case load being light, he frequently sits in on other district courts. Did stint in Dean Acheson's Washington law firm, Covington and Burling. Republican.

Bernard Segal

President of the American Bar Association, 62. Was a loquacious and energetic chairman of the ABA's influential watchdog on court appointments, the Committee on Federal Judiciary. Wealthy Philadelphia lawyer and an opponent of some forms of civil disobedience. But served as a co-chairman of Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights under Law, which represented civil rights workers in Mississippi in the mid-1960s. Republican.

Herbert Wechsler

Harlan Fiske Stone Professor of Constitutional Law at Columbia University, 60. A leading scholar, with fine sensitivity to changing legal nuances in criminal law. Director of the American Law Institute, an important force for standardization and modernization of U.S. law and for improved administration of justice. Headed Institute's 10-year project to draw up the now widely used Model Penal Code. During World War II, U.S. Assistant Attorney, General in charge of the War Division, then adviser to U.S. members of the Nuremberg tribunal. Democrat.

Charles Alan Wright

Charles T. McCormick Professor of Law at the University of Texas, 42. Despite his youth, a legal scholar of national reputation. Author of a definitive work on federal courts. Member of the U.S. Judicial Conferences standing committee on federal court rules of practice and procedure, and governing council of the elite American Law Institute. Was vigorous supporter of Haynsworth. Would qualify as moderately conservative "Southern" appointee. Republican.

FROM O. WENDELL TO G. HARROLD—A JUDICIAL GENEALOGY

The Supreme Court seat for which Harrold Carswell was nominated has made its share of history and headlines. Graced for 30 years by the wit and wisdom of Oliver Wendell Holmes it came to be known as the "Jewish seat" when Holmes was succeeded by Associate Justice Benjamin Cardozo (1932), Felix Frankfurter (1939), Arthur Goldberg (1962) and Abe Fortas (1965). When Fortas resigned over a financial scandal. Clement Haynsworth was nominated for the seat. The Senate rejected him on grounds of ethical shortcomings. Then came Carswell, for whom his most vocal Senate supporter, Nebraska's Roman Hruska, made the strange case last week: "Even if he were mediocre, there are a lot of mediocre judges and people and lawyers. Aren't they entitled to a little representation and a little chance? We can't have all Brandeises and Frankfurters and Cardozos and stuff like that there."

HISTORIC LAND REFORM IN VIETNAM

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. President, a historic but little noticed event took place on March 16 when the National Assembly of the Republic of Vietnam voted final passage of a massive land reform program which when fully implemented will provide for the free distribution of 3 million acres of land among 1 million South Vietnamese peasant farmers. This is one of the most encouraging bits of news to come out of Vietnam for a long time. If effectively implemented, and there is considerable evidence that it will be, it will do a great deal to complement the Nixon administration policy of Vietnamization. And certainly it will do as much as any other single reform to stabilize conditions in South Vietnam and to strengthen the capacity of that country to resist takeover either by the Vietcong or the North Vietnamese forces.

In the long and tragic history of our involvement in Vietnam there is no greater failure than the glaring absence of genuine major land reform. Providing the opportunity for South Vietnamese peasants to become landowners will not guarantee the survival of a non-Communist political regime in South Vietnam. But a study of modern world history clearly suggests that in semi-feudal, underdeveloped nations like South Vietnam conversion of peasants from tenants to landowners has been the absolutely essential first step toward achieving a more democratic, a more stable, and a more economically progressive society.

Mr. President, the significance of this land reform program, which is being signed into law today by President Thieu, was effectively described by an editorial published in yesterday's Washington Evening Star. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Mar. 25, 1970]

There is a great predilection among the news disseminators of this country to point out, with appropriate expressions of horror, everything that is wrong with the government in Saigon. This is as it should be. President Thieu should be criticized for every repressive move he makes.

But an interest in Saigon's warts should not make it impossible to appreciate the occasional beauty spots that appear. And yet, to judge from the reaction to the passage of Thieu's land reform program, our sense of appreciation has become dulled. The final passage of the reform bill—the best news to come out of Vietnam since the end of the Japanese occupation—was, with a very few exceptions, overlooked.

The program is important for three reasons. First, it is right for the peasants and tenant farmers to own the land they till. Second, it can have a considerable beneficial impact on the popularity and the stability of the central government. Finally, it robs the Viet Cong of their major selling point.

The plan calls for the free distribution of 3 million acres of land among some 1 million families. It is—disregarding the Chinese communist program—the most massive land reform project in the Far East of modern history. And the Chinese program can, in common with all Communist land reforms, be logically disregarded in view of its temporary nature. The record shows that soon after the distribution all the land is reclaimed by the state.

There is little justification for cynicism about Thieu's intention to carry out the reform. The program was conceived by him and pushed through a reluctant assembly. Additional evidence of his sincerity can be found in the fact that he has already initiated the distribution of 150,000 acres of government-owned lands—a move that deprived some well-placed officials of a major source of income.

The plan will cost the Saigon government some $400 million over the next eight years in payment to the former landowners. The United States has, so far, pledged $40 million toward that cost. If more is needed it should be promptly forthcoming.

The total cost would be less than the cost to us of one week of the Vietnam war. When the land reform is carried out, it will seriously undermine the appeal of the Viet Cong and thus be a major incentive to them to seek an acceptable political settlement with Saigon. Washington, as a matter of enlightened self-interest, should give the program every bit of encouragement and support it needs.

ABA FAILS ON GENOCIDE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I invite attention to an excellent editorial published in the Milwaukee Journal of February 27, 1970. The editorial offers interesting and forceful insight into the ABA refusal to endorse the United Nations Convention on Genocide.

The editorial's analysis of the ABA failure in this important area goes right to the heart of the matter, and concludes that much of the crucial opposition to ratification came from an influential bloc of southern, midwest, and western conservative delegates.

I am in firm agreement with the conclusion of this fine editorial:

It will be shameful if we continue to stand aside; and refuse to state officially that we oppose killing or harassing people on racial or other grounds. The Senate should ratify the treaty, as President Nixon asked, regardless of the narrow majority of ABA delegates who say "no."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "ABA Fails on Genocide" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Milwaukee Journal, Feb. 27, 1970]

ABA FAILS ON GENOCIDE

The American Bar Association House of Delegates rejected the recommendation of its Committee on World Order Under Law that it support ratification of the United Nations Convention on Genocide.

The Association was asked to agree that deliberate liquidation or harassment of any group for reasons of race, color, sex, or anything else is abhorrent. But Southern delegates and Mid-West and Western conservatives carried the day, as they have in the past. One reason, treaty supporters contend, is that some delegates feel that there are racial connotations to the agreement—that it is somehow aimed at those who don't want equal rights for Negroes in this country.

The extremes to which the arguments want are illustrated by Attorney Roy E. Willy, of South Dakota, who said: "The way to maintain peace is for the United States to remain strong and free. I come from foreign ancestry. I wouldn't be here if we didn't commit genocide by getting rid of the Indians . . . ." The implication is that if some people climbed up over the bodies of others, such action should not be closed to others.

President Nixon, his Attorney General and many legal experts say that there is nothing in our Constitution contrary to the Genocide Convention. It has been ratified by 75 nations. It will be shameful if we continue to stand aside and refuse to state officially that we oppose killing or harassing people on racial or other grounds. The Senate should ratify the treaty, as President Nixon asked, regardless of the narrow majority of ABA delegates who say "no."

RAILROAD BOXCAR SHORTAGE

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, for many years—as long as I can remember—the Nation has been greatly handicapped by a shortage of railroad boxcars. For as many years, complaints have been followed by investigations but too little has been accomplished to correct the recurring serious problem.

Secretary of Agriculture Clifford M. Hardin testified before the Senate Committee on Commerce this week and stated the problem as it relates to agriculture. There can be no further excuse for allowing farmers, among others, to suffer continuing economic losses resulting from the boxcar shortage with the evidence now available to Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, the testimony of Secretary of Agriculture Clifford M. Hardin, before a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE CLIFFORD M. HARDIN

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: The continuously growing shortage of railroad boxcars presents a serious threat to the economy of this Nation. It's especially bad for the agricultural sector. That's why I appreciate the opportunity to discuss this matter with your Committee today.

Many distinguished members of both houses of the Congress are deeply concerned about the critical situation regarding railroad movement of agricultural commodities.

The problem is simple. It involves a severe shortage of ordinary boxcars suitable for bulk movement of farm commodities from country points, especially during the harvest period.

The answer to the problem is complex: It involves money for equipment, changing railcar usage patterns, rising costs, and distribution of available equipment into agricultural areas at times of peak harvest demand.

The number of plain boxcars in use has declined annually for the past 11 years or more.

Between Jan. 1, 1959 and Jan. 1, 1970, this decline was a sharp 42.7 percent.

On Jan. 1, 1959, American railroads had 674,792 such boxcars; by Jan. 1 this year, this total had dropped to 386,499. Of these boxcars, the total of narrow-door boxcars suitable for grain hauling had declined to 180,574 as of terminals—increased from 58,383 on Jan. 1, 1959, to 125,867 on Jan. 1, 1970. However, these hopper cars are used for many purposes other than the transportation of grain and similarly-handled agricultural products. They have by no means met the current needs of the grain industry.

In addition to the shortage of ordinary boxcars, there is also a critical shortage of mechanical refrigerated cars for the movement of perishable agricultural products.

While the boxcar shortage has grown increasingly acute since 1959, the population of the United States has increased by more than 27 million persons. The need for adequate movement of the basic agricultural raw materials into the food production areas of our Nation increases daily.

Complicating matters even more are two strictly agricultural problems. One is the matter of greatly increased crop volumes which must be moved and the particularly sharp increase in fall-harvested crops.

Wheat production during the 1959–70 period has expanded from around 1 billion bushels annually to about 1½ billion; corn production has grown from around 3.8 billion bushels to around 4.5 billion; grain sorghum from 555 million bushels to more than 700 million; and soybean production has nearly doubled—to the point where it now exceeds 1 billion bushels annually. Furthermore, the percentage of the corn and grain sorghum crops moved off the farm has increased substantially.

For these four crops alone, the jump in annual output in 11 years has been nearly 2 billion bushels. An ordinary boxcar hauls around 2,000 bushels of grain. So the problem is clearly magnified. Instead of 288,293 fewer boxcars, we need many, many more. Of course, all of us know that we don't need a million more boxcars to move the extra 2 billion bushels increase in productivity. Much of the extra production is fed to livestock on farms, and much is moved by truck and barge lines. But the great bulk moves by rail. And need for suitable boxcars is the crux of the entire problem.

Complicating factors are present in this transportation problem.

Corn production patterns have changed in the last few years. In prior years, ear corn from the fields was stored for long periods in on-farm cribs. With the advent of picker-shellers, corn is now harvested in a relatively short time. There has been a marked increase in marketing of corn off the farm. The picker-sheller corn harvest requires immediate drying before moving into commercial markets. This has placed an additional heavy burden on the carriers.

Soaring production from our fields has also led to increased pressures to move agricultural products into export. These exports are essential to the health of our Nation's economy. They provide us with a major share of our favorable balance of payments in international trade.

Yet, today we are losing export markets. We are losing them because grain cannot be delivered to port when it is needed. For instance, we could have sold much more grain sorghum for export this year had it been possible to achieve timely deliveries.

Then there is the very personal matter of individual farmers losing grain because they have to pile it on the ground at harvest time. Merchants refuse to buy grain at country points because they cannot move it to markets, and because they cannot afford to pay current interest rates on money to carry grain inventories.

The Department has long been mindful of the steadily worsening railcar shortage, and we have done everything within our authority to help alleviate the problem.

Commodity Credit Corporation each year has carefully planned and accomplished the reconcentration of CCC-owned grain as far in advance of harvest season as possible in order that its grain would not compete with farmers' grain for the use of boxcars at peak periods. Last year, for example, the CCC movement was substantially complete by Oct. 1, thus avoiding the critical car shortage of the last quarter. Similarly, shipments have been moved this year as rapidly as cars could be obtained, and we hope to again see CCC grain out of the way before harvest.

USDA took the lead in the development of origin-sampling techniques utilizing automatic samplers at country origins. We hope to encourage the acceptance of origin grades throughout the industry. When this practice is adopted and accepted by the industry, the need for intermediate inspection of grain should be sharply reduced. This will reduce the traditional delay of cars at inspection points.

The Department recently reviewed its farm storage and drying equipment loan program and made changes which should encourage the expansion of on-farm storage and drying systems. This should help substantially to relieve the transportation burden at peak harvest periods. In some 20 years of operation, more than a billion bushels of farm storage facilities have been constructed under this program.

Finally, in considering the total U.S. agricultural picture—the sharply expanding need for transportation facilities and the failure of railroad carriers to provide suitable equipment—you can come to only one conclusion.

There is a disastrous breakdown in the agricultural rail transportation system.

What can be done about this crisis?

Many efforts are being made to change the rules, regulations, and procedures in order to achieve better car utilization and distribution. These efforts are helpful and should be encouraged, but generally they strive towards greater use of a totally inadequate fleet of cars.

We favor ICC Order 252 which provides incentive per diem in emergencies and earmarks funds for the purchase of plain boxcars.

We favor the mandatory return of boxcars to western railroads.

We believe the problem can be solved on a long-term basis only when some method is developed to promote the construction of more boxcars.

ENVIRONMENTAL WARFARE IN VIETNAM: HAS TECHNOLOGY SHAPED OUR POLICY?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in the last 9 years we have conducted a program, initiated on a modest scale and a humane basis, that has grown to the point where the United States has created a new instrument of large-scale force—environmental warfare. During this period 100,000,000 pounds of chemical herbicides have been sprayed on 5 million acres in South Vietnam, an area the size of the State of Massachusetts.

Disturbing facts have begun to filter through the thick screen of secrecy that inevitably covers military operations. Inadvertent crop damage, ecologic disruptions, often irreversible, and alleged cases of deformed babies and human deaths and illnesses have been reported.

The major defoliant in use in Vietnam is called "Orange," a mixture of 2,4,5-T and 2,4-D. Both are herbicides that have become the subjects of great controversy; 2,4,5-T was shown in a study contracted out by the National Institutes of Health to produce an extremely high rate of fetal deformities in the animals tested. Another series of tests should be completed soon. Preliminary results tend to fortify the earlier conclusions. Yet, the Department of Defense continues to use the highly questionable chemical on a large scale and to the best of my knowledge has not systematically investigated the claims that our defoliation program had caused deformities in Vietnamese babies.

In fact, when such information began to leak out of Vietnam the lid of secrecy was clamped down on the Saigon press. Reports of deaths and illnesses allegedly caused by defoliants, have also been hushed up. However, the State Department, late last year, released information that the United States has paid the South Vietnam Government $3.5 million to settle claims for damage to private property including croplands. Many claims are still pending. This is just an indication of the extent of damage caused thus far.

The anticrop program continues even though the Department of Defense has admitted that at best it is difficult to determine whether crops are intended for fighting units or noncombatants. Dr. Jean Mayer, now the President's special adviser for nutrition, asserted in 1967 that the ultimate target of an anticrop campaign is the civilian population. Surely, no one can contest that fighting units will use all their power to survive. They can deprive local noncombatants of their food supply, if necessary.

We have defoliated areas along logistics routes, justified on the basis that ambushes are reduced or curtailed. A sad example of how man can easily let technology take charge is the use of chemicals along the entire 60-mile Rung Sat Canal that leads from the sea to Saigon. The reason for searing the edges of the canal was to prevent attacks on ships. To date no ships have been sunk before or after defoliation. The military has admitted that a serious attack could be mounted along only 1 mile of the canal where it narrows. As a result, however, mangrove trees, once a vital part of the canal life system, have been killed on a massive scale.

Innumerable cases can be cited. Military restrictions have made it difficult, if not impossible, to objectively assess their impact. Yet, the burden of proof should rest on the shoulders of those who advocate these policies. Military benefits must greatly outweigh the harmful political, social, physical, as well as military side effects if there is even anything to the old claim that such a policy is justified.

If such proof is not available, which I believe is true, then the American people are witnessing another example of how technology determines policy instead of vice versa.

In 1962 Rachel Carson wrote "Silent Spring," a book that changed our attitudes toward technology and with it the course of history. She awakened a nation to the fact that a social price is paid for every step of technological progress. Now the Federal and State Governments are starting a continuous assessment of herbicides and insecticides. Their process of assessment leaves much to be desired but progress has been made. If the gallant lady were alive today she might be tempted to write a sequel to her classic, a Vietnam reader entitled "Silent Tet." The large-scale application of herbicides would give the songbirds still alive little to sing about and the demoralized Vietnamese little solace in the music of nature.

The use of herbicides clearly illustrates two themes that Miss Carson spotlighted in her book. First, technology drives policy. If we can do something then we will find the rationale to do it. Technology is irresistible. We developed herbicides and then decided to use them in Vietnam. In case after case, though, as with the B–52's, technology not designed for use in Southeast Asia has failed to accomplish our objectives. In fact it has often been counterproductive.

Second, we have looked to technology as a short cut that too often bypasses essential processes—be they biological, social, or political. The defoliation of forests, infiltration routes and base perimeters together with crop spraying have caused severe adverse affects.

Politically, we have boxed ourselves in with respect to the Geneva protocol. Those countries that have signed the protocol have forsworn the first use of "asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials, or devices." So have we. Yet, a Swedish resolution, placed before the main political committee of the U.N. General Assembly, condemned the use of tear gas and defoliants in war. It was supported by 80 nations last December. Only the United States, Australia, and Portugal voted against the resolution.

We can hardly admit to a violation of the chemical and biological warfare treaty that we will soon be asked to ratify. On the other hand, if we ratify the treaty with reservations, a majority of nations of the world could and most likely would immediately accuse the United States of violating the treaty.

Some Americans have clearly stated that the use of herbicides in Vietnam amounts to a war atrocity. There is good reason to believe that many high-level decisionmakers in the administration regret the day we sprayed the first ounce of herbicide on the first plant in Southeast Asia and are hopeful that the program will be permanently discontinued. This position fortifies the statements of those who have spoken out publicly.

The program that grew like Topsy has created long term biological, ecological, and political problems. Nine years and 100,000,000 pounds of chemicals later we are beginning to realize that American technology can drive policies, in foreign as well as domestic affairs, that are painfully expensive in the final accounting.

Mr. President, for these reasons I am strongly in favor of a cessation of the use and stockpiling of herbicides for military purposes by the Department of Defense.

The forcing function of technology has allowed the introduction of a new form of warfare—a type that is militarily ineffective, biologically and ecologically damaging, and politically explosive. We have to develop new attitudes so that we will not automatically equate technology with progress or efficiency and will not see it as a panacea to cure the problems of the Nation and of the world.

LENIN'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, this year the United Nations is celebrating "International Education Year." As a part of this celebration, the U.N. is going to honor the 100th anniversary of Lenin's birth.

The birthday celebration for the late and unlamented dictator will include a UNESCO symposium on the theme "Lenin and the development of science, culture, and education." If the participants in this symposium are looking for positive contributions to any of those fields, it could be the shortest symposium in recorded history.

Lenin's conception of science was primitive. His dogmatic turn of mind made him incapable of appreciating the scientist's sceptical and inquisitive turn of mind.

Lenin's approach to cultural questions set a pattern for subsequent totalitarian regimes. He believed that all cultural matters should be ruthlessly politicized. Art became a tasteless instrument of politics, controlled by Communist Party operatives.

The original support for this symposium came from UNESCO. It was proposed by the Soviet Union to the UNESCO General Conference in 1968, not long after the invasion of Czechoslovakia; 26 other states backed the Soviet proposal. Of course, the United States delegation opposed it, with great energy. During the debate, two other Member states joined us in speaking against the symposium.

In the vote on the proposal 48 member states voted for the symposium; the United States and six other member states voted against; 21 abstained; and 47 were recorded as absent.

After the vote was taken, the Assistant Director General of UNESCO made some remarks to the effect that the symposium will be conducted in a manner that respects free discussion and the honest pursuit of truth.

If that is the case, it will be ironic. Lenin never made any pretense of respecting free discussion or the honest pursuit of truth.

Lenin's approach to education was similarly a blend of the banal and the sinister. He was incapable of appreciating the distinction between propaganda, which attempts to enslave the mind, and education, which attempts to liberate the mind.

We wish the participants in the Lenin symposium all the best. They deserve our sympathy. What could be more tiresome than pondering Lenin's contributions to these matters?

The only thing that can be said for this symposium is that it is not especially expensive. Thus far, $8,000 has been budgeted for it, out of UNESCO's regular budget of $77.4 million. Still, $8,000 spent honoring Lenin is $8,000 too much.

It was after the vote at the UNESCO General Conference that the U.N. Human Rights Commission "welcomed" the Lenin symposium and asked the Chairman of the Commission to consult with UNESCO about sending a commission of representatives to the symposium. The U.S. representatives opposed this.

So this is where we stand. UNESCO will honor a dictatorial propagandist as a part of International Education Year. And the U.N. Human Rights Commission will volunteer to honor a mass murderer.

Of course, there is nothing the U.N. can do to rehabilitate Lenin. His name is odious wherever his deeds are known and men value freedom.

The only real loser in this sorry performance is the United Nations itself. We hope that in the future the members of that organization will spend their time pondering the world's problems, rather than wasting time honoring one of the men who got the world into its current dangerous mess.

Even if the United Nations cannot realistically expect to solve the world's problems, it can at least avoid birthday parties for infamous tyrants.

The U.N. can at least avoid actions which wound the feelings of the many millions of oppressed peoples who owe their oppression to Lenin's revolution. The U.N.'s decision to honor Lenin is an odious insult to those who live in Lenin's enduring prison, and to the memories of those many millions who have been murdered by the dictatorship which Lenin launched.

Mr. President, with this in mind I want to offer some especially warm words of friendship to all Americans of Byelorussian origin. Today they celebrate the 52d anniversary of the proclamation of independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic.

Unfortunately, the only Byelorussians who can celebrate today are those who no longer live in Byelorussia. That Republic was an early casualty of the Russian Revolution and of Lenin's brutal policies regarding the rights of the various nationalities within the Russian Empire.

We sometimes forget how much controversy raged within Russia immediately after the revolution. In that period of great turmoil, the tiny Bolshevik party struggled to gain control of the seething nation.

In the first hours of triumph the Bolsheviks were not strong enough to govern in the manner of which they are most fond—unvarnished terror. The Bolsheviks understood that they could not launch their terror regime until they had lulled some of the fears of people who were hoping for the best from the revolution.

The Bolsheviks understood that many persons were particularly worried about what was called "the nationalities question." These people wanted some respect and autonomy for the many nationalities that had existed for centuries in the territory that was to be encompassed by the U.S.S.R. Thus Lenin's government adopted the rhetoric of tolerance toward the ancient peoples of the Russian Empire.

But this was mere rhetoric, accompanied by duplicitous and impotent constitutions. These constitutions granted rights on paper which were crushed in reality by the Red army and the secret police.

The last vestige of Byelorussian independence was extinguished in 1921. Since then the dream of Byelorussian independence has been faithfully cherished by those Byelorussians fortunate enough to have escaped the long night of tyranny that has descended on their native land.

This dreadful chapter in Soviet history should cause us to renew our dedication to the freedoms we enjoy, and to the hope that those who today are denied these freedoms may one day be rescued from oppression.

UNKNOWN UNKNOWNS IN DEFENSE PROCUREMENT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Washington Star for Wednesday, March 25, contains an article by Orr Kelly which combines an intelligent analysis of some of the major problems in defense weapons system procurement with the light touch of a professional writer.

Mr. Kelly writes about an article in the Harvard Business Review by Hudson B. Drake and Drake's Unk-Unk chart.

Unk-Unk's are not characters from George Orwell's "Animal Farm." Unk-Unk's are unknown unknowns, as compared with the "known unknowns" of defense procurement. He believes that one of the major problems in defense contracting and a cause of the present scandalous system is the Unk-Unks. Contractors can anticipate that in certain areas there will be unknowns. These are the known unknowns. But what really baffles them, according to Drake, are the unanticipated unknowns which pop up during key phases of defense weapon system production.

The article proposes a number of reforms, many of which have considerable merit. However, I must say that I am unable to comprehend very clearly one key paragraph from Drake's article which prescribes reform in the following terms:

> What is really needed is reformed policy that includes viable estimating procedures and a procurement policy for major system acquisitions that is consistent with the technical development process and the evolution of a sound technical baseline on which to formulate realistic estimates of cost and schedule.

Perhaps that paragraph should be added to the Unk-Unk's.

While this is not the place to outline the reforms needed in defense procurement in detail, my own view is that we must prevent buy in bidding—deliberate low bidding to get a contract.

We should institute day-to-day supervision of contract costs—called ditch-digging in the trade—rather than relying on some new contract system—such as total package procurement or PERT or PEP or value engineering. Essentially, these are gimmicks and public relations measures rather than fundamental means of checking costs and waste.

We need more production of prototypes before major production begins. The way to meet the problem of both known unknowns, and Unk-Unk's, is to build a prototype first.

If it does not fly, if the wings crack, if it fails to meet specifications, if it is too far advanced for the state of the art, all that has been lost are the funds for development and the prototype. That might be high, but it is a great deal less than the huge overruns we are now experiencing on the C–5A, Poseidon, MBT–70, and, in fact, every major weapon in the weapons system arsenal.

Finally, I would say we need to simplify our weapons. We are in trouble because weapons are asked to do too much. The black boxes, the compasses and radars and gyroscopes, and the weight produced a generation of weapons which are far too costly, are almost never delivered on time, and which do not function according to their specifications.

I commend the article and the problem of the Unk-Unk's to the readers of the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNK-UNKs MAR DEFENSE CONTRACTS

(By Orr Kelly)

Anyone who wants to know what to do about cost overruns, poor performance and all those bugaboos of the military weapons business should take a long look at Hudson B. Drake's UNK-UNK Chart.

Drake, director of the President's Commission on White House Fellows while on leave from North American Rockwell Corp., is the author of one of two recent articles in the Harvard Business Review that have received widespread attention in the defense industry.

Drake's article, in the January-February issue, is entitled "Major DOD (Department of Defense) Procurements at War with Reality." The other piece, "Anguish in the Defense Industry," appeared in the November-December issue and was written by Richard M. Anderson, director of H. R. Land & Co., a Los Angeles consulting firm.

Together, they give a broad picture of what is wrong with both the Defense Department and defense industry.

A large foldout chart showing how unknowns are gradually eliminated during the development of a new weapons system accompanies Drake's article.

There are two kinds of unknowns—known, or anticipated, unknowns, and unknown, or unanticipated, unknowns—referred to as UNK-UNKs.

The UNK-UNKs, obviously, can be more troublesome and more costly than anticipated problems simply because they are unexpected.

Such a problem has just occurred in the F-111 airplane. Even though the plane has been flying for several years, even in combat, the entire fleet, except for seven research planes, is now grounded because of a totally unanticipated problem with a new kind of steel used in the wing.

What Drake's chart shows is that, in the typical major development program, the UNK-UNKs normally don't rear their ugly little heads until well along in the program, when the system is being put together and tested. Most importantly, that is after the government and contractor have signed a contract agreeing on price and production schedule.

Drake thinks some of the things done under the Nixon administration are moves in the right direction—but he thinks much more needs to be done.

"What is really needed," he writes, "is reformed policy that includes viable estimating procedures and a procurement policy for major system acquisitions that is consistent with the technical development process and the evolution of a sound technical baseline on which to formulate realistic estimates of cost and schedule.

"Until this reform comes, a sense of emergency will permeate major-system work, and the public, conscious of this tension, will continue in its attitude of near panic."

While Drake's recommendations are directed primarily at the Pentagon, Anderson argues that the defense contractors had better shape up, too.

Some reforms instituted in the early 1960s by Robert S. McNamara were good, but he failed to bring the contractors along with him, Anderson feels. McNamara set up a "contract definition" program, for example, in which the goal was to work out on paper the broad outlines of a new program.

"More accustomed to constant fire fighting than thorough planning, the sizable contractor task forces assembled to accomplish this task often did not know how to go about their planning function," Anderson writes.

Because they did not do their planning well, he says, "it was a rare competition in which at least one of the contenders was not willing to revert to the habits of the old environment and bid whatever it took to win the award. . .

"In short, contractors often signed fixed-price, total-package contracts at prices below the expected costs, containing risks that were not thoroughly appraised, and for which they lacked the management discipline necessary to perform the work in an efficient manner.

"With hindsight, such bidding appears incredibly naive. But at the time many experienced defense-industry managers thought it naive to do anything else."

This, one must remember, was written well before the president of Lockheed asked the Defense Department for financial help on four contracts—two of them total-package programs on which Lockheed was the prime contractor.

The danger now is that demands for reform will center on the wrong things rather than the real problems, with the result that the real problems will remain unsloved and that the country will lose the full advantage of the advanced technology that landed a man on the moon.

The loss will not be only in military and space technology but in those areas such as pollution control and surface transportation where the skills of the military-industrial complex might help us to keep this a livable world.

NOMINATION OF GEORGE HARROLD CARSWELL TO THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, the real issue in the current dispute over the confirmation of the nomination of a Supreme Court Justice is whether President Nixon will have the right to change the direction of the Court by appointing a strict constructionist, as he promised the American people he would do before his election.

In an effort to prevent the President from fulfilling this pledge, attacks have been made on the character, ability, and philosophy of, first Judge Haynsworth and now, Judge Carswell. Yet these attacks are basically unfair, because they are made in an effort to conceal the real reason for the opposition to President Nixon's nominees.

An editorial published in the Washington Daily News of March 23 puts the issues in the Carswell nomination in their true perspective. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD, and commend it to the attention of Senators.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CARSWELL CASE

What must be remembered about these Senate battles over Supreme Court nominations is that a struggle of epochal proportions is under way as President Nixon attempts to use every opportunity to shift the U.S. Supreme Court to the right—as he pledged repeatedly in his campaign to do.

The northern Democrats, civil rights leaders and other liberals who liked the liberal expansionist rulings of the Warren Court of the past 17 years and want no change are fighting with every device at their command to block the President's intentions.

It is our belief that, along with other things, the American people in their 1968 presidential vote did opt for a change in Supreme Court direction, particularly in such fields as pornography and police powers, and for more consideration for the rights of victims versus the rights of criminals and protestors.

If opponents should succeed in blocking the current nominee, Judge G. Harrold Carswell, it's 10-to-1 they will face another fight against "a strict constructionist of the Constitution" nominee. They are correct in attaching great importance to each Supreme Court nominee since President Nixon probably will have enough appointment opportunities to set the court's philosophy for years to come.

In our opinion, unless someone has "anti" evidence of a stronger nature than has so far been revealed, the nomination of Judge Carswell should be confirmed.

We believe Judge Carswell's word that he long since has shelved any tendency to racial prejudices he once might have had.

The other chief weapon being used against him, the claim he is some sort of a legal pygmy, seems mighty strained and contrived to us.

Judge Carswell may not be the greatest legal mind sitting on a lower federal court today.

But, as even his opponents know, some of the greatest justices in history came to the court without great legal reputations. And twice since his nomination has been before the Senate, the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary has unanimously concluded that Judge Carswell is qualified as to "integrity, judicial temperament and professional competence to sit on the Supreme Court."

He served four years as a district attorney, 10 years as a federal district judge in Northern Florida and in June, 1969, was confirmed unanimously by the Senate for elevation to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

It is passing strange that if Judge Carswell's judicial record was as low-grade as opponents now claim, no voices of protest were raised when he was nominated to the appeals court—the nation's second highest court.

Most damaging specific development against him in our opinion has been the unexplained decision by the respected retired chief judge of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, Elbert P. Tuttle, of Atlanta, that he could not testify in support of Judge Carswell's nomination. This after Judge Tuttle had sent a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee offering to testify "to express my great confidence in him as a person and a judge."

Fifth Circuit Judge John Minor Wisdom of New Orleans has made clear, too, he is not supporting the Carswell nomination but also says he is not opposing him. Three other of Judge Caswell's colleagues of the Fifth Circuit have written glowing letters stating he is qualified in every way for the highest bench, but still others have not come to his support.

It is worth noting that opponents who are making so much out of the lack of unanimous support for Judge Carswell from his circuit court colleagues were totally unimpressed by the unanimous support given by his cohorts of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals for Judge Clement F. Hainsworth when he was an unsuccessful Supreme Court nominee before Carswell.

It also is worth noting that practically every senator now opposing Carswell opposed the Haynsworth nomination.

The Supreme Court desperately needs to be at full strength. Unless someone like Judge Tuttle has some strong evidence—and is willing to speak up—the Senate should confirm Judge Carswell and let the court get on with its work.

ISRAEL MUST BE ALLOWED TO DEFEND ITSELF

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, Monday's announcement by Secretary of State Rogers of the administration's decision to withhold sale of jet aircraft to Israel can only serve to encourage Soviet and Arab intransigence in the Middle East. It is a further sign—if any more were needed—that this administration deludes itself into thinking that it can win some measure of Arab favor by vacillating and backtracking on its commitments to Israel.

There could hardly be a greater delusion. Arab leaders will settle for nothing less from the United States than a renunciation of our historic ties to Israel. That, of course, is unthinkable and, therefore, we can only be pursuing a will-o'-the-wisp in our pursuit of influence with Israel's mortal enemies.

At the same time, by causing Israel to question our constancy and determination, we run the grave risk of impelling that brave people to an act of desperation. We surely cannot expect them to watch unconcernedly as the Russians arm and rearm the Arabs with vast quantities of new weapons. Nor can we expect them to hazard their existence on our estimate of their needs. They must and will determine for themselves the risk to their very survival. And if, through our negligence, they decided that the arms imbalance appears to be growing too great in favor of the Arabs, we should not be surprised to see Israel launch another preemptive strike against their enemies.

And that would mean yet another renewal of full-scale war in an area that has known too much war during the last quarter century. I need hardly remind my colleagues how surpassingly dangerous to world peace would be that kind of outbreak, and how ruinous to the nations in the region.

Yet we are told that the precise purpose of America's policy in withholding arms from Israel is to prevent war, to stabilize the political situation. Mr. President, I can only characterize that view as fatuous. It completely ignores the psychology of the situation. It completely ignores the history of it. It concentrates instead on the kind of geopolitical abstractions that led German planners from one disaster to another during this century. It is a view so full of danger to our own vital interests in the Middle East that I find it hard to believe that it was formulated by American officials. But it was, of course, and that is the tragedy of it.

Mr. President, we had best stop deluding ourselves. We had best stop imagining that we can purchase the good will of those who revile us by playing games with the security of our one and only friend and ally in the region. We need, instead, to repeat over and over again—and back our words with actions—that we intend to continue to supply Israel with the tools of survival, so that neither the Arabs nor their Soviet manipulators will be able to suppose that time is on their side in the monstrous campaign to destroy Israel.

In the meantime, as a thoughtful constituent of mine, Mr. Barnett Labowitz, recently wrote me:

> The U.S. should continue to counsel Israel in its use of military power, to generosity and humanity in its relations with the Arabs who live in the occupied territories, its concern for Arab refugees. No friend of Israel would wish other advice to be given.

Military strength, generosity, and humanity—that is the formula for lasting peace in the Middle East. I strongly urge President Nixon and Secretary Rogers to do all in America's power to implement it.

DRUG ABUSE

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, drug abuse and the related problems of physical and psychologcial damage caused by drugs is one of the most important problems confronting youth in our metropolitan areas. We in the Senate are especially fortunate that the distinguished Senator from Iowa (Mr. HUGHES) has given the problem his special attention. The Special Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Narcotics, chaired by Senator HUGHES, on which I am privileged to serve, is presently conducting hearings on this important problem, and the testimony provided by experts from all levels of Government and medical sciences has been invaluable.

Yet even as the hearings continue, and the problem gains increasing national attention, our treatment facilities for addicts are becoming overcrowded and frequently losing funds. The Surgeon General has certified only two States as having adequate treatment facilities: New York and California. My State of Pennsylvania has few treatment facilities adequately financed well enough to meet the growing needs among our youth.

Philadelphia's treatment facilities, for example, are constantly overcrowded. The March 15 edition of the Philadelphia Inquirer printed an excellent article about the growing problem of drug addiction among youth, and the difficulties of providing adequate treatment and care for them, and I request that this article be inserted at the completion of my statement.

The problem in Pittsburgh is equally bad. A study sent to me by Charles Cohen, a counselor at the Allegheny County Juvenile Detention Home in Pittsburgh, showed that 63 percent of children from 10 to 17 years old that he interviewed had experimented with drugs. These children are the victims of our inadequate facilities. For these children the future is not particularly bright, since they are awaiting disposition by the courts, and the courts have nowhere to send them for treatment if they have serious problems with narcotics.

It is my understanding, from discussions with officers of the court in Pittsburgh, that the problem among youth is becoming more acute rather than lessening. They are simply frustrated by the lack of treatment facilities for youth.

Pittsburgh is also an excellent example of the problem we face in the future. For whereas the city has inadequate treatment facilities, the television stations which usually reach the young have done an excellent job in exposing the problem. However, there is no single approach to this problem. We cannot have educational programs, without treatment facilities and expect to solve the problem. We must insure on-going treatment facilities to meet the problem.

Thus, it distresses me greatly that one of Pittsburgh's better facilities is in danger of being closed. The Hill House Rehabilitation Center which treats 700 addicts on Lomotil a nonnarcotic pill developed at the rehabilitation center in Waco, Tex., has lost its funds from the local CAP agency in Pittsburgh. I am sure that all individuals interested in the question of treatment facilities will be interested in an article from the March 22 Pittsburgh Press. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I look forward to the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Narcotics reporting significant proposals to help solve our drug abuse problem. It is a problem that must not be allowed to grow any greater.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CENTER LOSES FUNDS TO "INNOVATIVE" PROGRAM: SUCCESS PERILS DRUG ADDICT AID

(By Al Donalson)

Success is spoiling the Hill House Rehabilitation Center.

Funds for the drug rehabilitation facility on Wylie Avenue in the Hill District were recently canceled by Community Action Pittsburgh (CAP), the city's anti-poverty agency.

The center, which operates on a budget of $100,000 a year and has 17 fulltime employes, may close.

CAP's action was explained by Robert Williams, the agency's director of planning.

"Federal funds channeling into the Pittsburgh area have dropped from $6.4 million to $4.5 million. National policy is to take money from programs which have been successful and distribute funds to those which have innovative quality," he said.

PROBE SLATED

All of this leaves Charles Mikell, the center's director, understandably upset. And one recent development in the local drug fight hasn't helped to soothe his ire.

He is very skeptical of the Allegheny County commissioners recently announced committee to investigate the drug problem in the county.

"At a time when most of us in drug treatment are fighting for our lives, the commissioners are going to waste the taxpayers money providing this panel with a staff that's going to make a study.

"We don't need studies, we need action," he said.

"While the commissioners are studying," he continued, "kids will be dying in alleys and on street corners from overdoses if this place closes."

The center, which opened in 1966, is now operating on contingency funds from the Community Chest. It presently has a caseload of 700 addicts and 80 alcoholics.

In addition, the center's kitchen serves a full dinner daily to about 80 local senior citizens.

"It's the only meal a lot of them get," said Mikell.

The basic treatment used in the center's health clinic, which is maintained by Mercy Hospital, is Lomotil, a nonnarcotic pill which alleviates the withdrawal pains of addicts trying to kick their habits.

It was developed at the federal rehabilitation center in Waco, Tex., and it is believed that Hill House is the only clinic in the country using it on a wide scale.

"We think we've been successful," Mikell said, "in terms of the number of addicts who realize they need help."

Addicts aren't solicited at the center—only those coming in on their own volition are admitted.

SUCCESS CITED

"If you want to look at it in more practical terms, addicts starting treatment with us use from four to five bags of heroin a day. After being with us a while, we get them down to about one or two bags a month," Mikell said.

Although the majority of the patients are blacks from the Hill District, about 25 per cent are whites—some coming from as far as Greensburg.

Mikell feels that drug rehabilitation in this country has been hampered by the Harrison Act of 1914, a statute still on the federal lawbooks.

"This law made drug addiction a criminal offense rather than a medical problem. It is punitive not only to the pushers and the users, but also to doctors who try to treat addicts," he said.

Even though the center's future is uncertain, Mikell is confident that the facility will continue to operate.

"I'm hoping that either the Community Chest or Model Cities will finance us on a continuing basis. I have a lot of faith in the good will of people, and I refuse to believe that those of good will are going to let this place close," he said.

Tom Sheridan, the center's white clinical psychiatrist, feels deeply about the operation. "It would be very tragic if this places closes," he said.

"Believe me, if white parents from Mount Lebanon, Bethel Park, Shadyside and other middle class areas allow their children to come to the heart of the ghetto for treatment at a shoestring operation, we must be doing something worthwhile."

DRUG ADDICTION AMONG YOUTH GROWING HERE

(By Acel Moore and James Lintz)

Is Philadelphia experiencing an epidemic of juvenile drug addiction?

Court statistics reveal as little of the problem as the visible part of a floating iceberg does of its bulk, but the answer they indicate is a strong "yes."

Of course, every juvenile in court on a narcotics charge is not an addict, but at least he's somewhere along the trail that could take him there—and he's getting more company.

231 JUVENILES IN '68

In 1968, a total of 231 juveniles appeared in court on such charges, according to Dr. Leonard Rosengarten, director of the juvenile division of Family Court, a branch of Common Pleas Court.

The figure for the following year, 1969, was 403, Dr. Rosengarten said.

And for the first 71 days of 1970, there already have been 160 cases, forecasting by projection about 800 such cases this year, double those of last year and more than three times the 1968 total.

Two-thirds of this year's 160 juveniles are white, emphasizing the warning to middle-class white parents that "the drug problem is moving out of the ghetto." And almost half are heroin cases.

YOUNGEST ADDICT

Included in the 160 is the youngest heroin addict authorities can recall here—a 6-year-old Northeast girl who had been using five bags a day—at $5 each.

But most juvenile addicts do not get into statistics, it is believed by authorities, because the nature of the problem is secretive, including a close-mouthed policy of users about sources and unwillingness of parents to air their children's affliction.

Juvenile addicts come to light almost always as a result of some other trouble. An example is a 16-year-old North Philadelphia boy who was arrested for burglary. It wasn't much of a burglary, and since he had no prior police record, he stood a good chance of getting off with probation.

However, before his case came up, his mother filed an incorrigibility petition, saying she was unable to control him and asking the court to put him in some institution.

WITHOUT A "FIX"

Just before his scheduled appearance in court, he told a social worker he was a heroin addict without a "fix," and asked for help to kick the habit.

A fair student and no problem until six months earlier, he had puzzled his mother with his sudden, steady deterioration in school performance and home behavior. When she filed the incorrigibility petition, she didn't know about his affliction. One of the things she had noted, however, was the disappearance of money and objects of value from her home.

The addiction was reported to the judge who, on recommendation of the public defender, committed the youth to Philadelphia General Hospital which has a drug-treatment center. The program is a painful three to five-day withdrawal or "drying-out" period.

He was transferred subsequently to Northwestern Mental Center where he was rejected, after evaluation, as an incurable addict since he required psychiatric and psychological therapy not available there.

The youth is now in Pennypack House, a detention center for juveniles in two wings of the adult House of Correction, awaiting disposal of his case.

INSUFFICIENT FUNDS

This is typical of Philadelphia's difficulty in coping with growing juvenile addiction. There are centers in the city, which offer treatment, but they are swamped by the numbers needing it. The juvenile problem always has been a stepchild, with insufficient funds and inadequate facilities.

But the price of whatever is necessary would be little, compared to the cost of the habit in money alone, according to figures compiled by a North Philadelphia osteopathic physician who has done considerable work in the field.

"The average heroin addict," said Dr. Frederick C. Hawkins Jr., "uses about seven bags a day to satisfy his craving, at a cost of $5 a bag or a daily cost of $35. This sum amounts to $245 a week or $12,740 a year.

"There are over 12,000 people in this city who have used an addicting drug more than three times in the last 30 days, and of this 12,000 there are more than 4000 hard-core addicts. The money required by 2000 addicts on half the hard-addict population to purchase heroin on a yearly basis is $25,480,000.

"The new addict or the individual first experiencing narcotic addiction quickly will exhaust his financial reserves, dissipate all available funds and come to the point where he must steal or perform immoral or illegal acts to obtain money to finance its habit.

ADDICT WILL STEAL

"The usual course of events is that the new addict will steal from his family or friends. I have had numerous reports of families complaining of objects or money missing from the home with pointed suspicions that a particular family member or friend was the the thief. (The mother of the 16-year-old boy noticed money and objects of value missing from her home without realizing why).

"The next step, once the pressure is insurmountable in the home, is that the new addict, by that time a hard user, resorts to performing an illegal act outside the family to get the money he needs."

One of the centers treating juvenile addicts is Gaudeniza House, 1934 W. Tioga St. Its president and director, John Ruocco, said he notices "a definite increase among teenagers using drugs," and that 10 adolescent addicts are now under treatment. They are subjected to complete withdrawal with no other drugs to ease the ordeal.

In addition, Ruocco said, there is a group of 50 who have been using drugs, but are not addicted yet. They are undergoing treatment on an outpatient basis.

Asked if he could estimate the number of juvenile addicts in the city, he put the figure at "a minimum of 15,000."

TEEN CHALLENGE

Another treatment center is Teen Challenge, 1620 N. Broad St., in a black neighborhood, where 90 percent of the patients are white, according to Sunday Bachman, business administrator of the religiously oriented center.

Miss Bachman said she hoped the racial proportions at the center would change "because we don't want people to think we're set up only for whites."

"In the last year," she said, "we've had more people wanting to enter our program than we can handle."

The system at Teen Challenge is the "cold turkey" withdrawal, finding the strength in religious conviction to "sweat it out" with no alleviating drugs.

There are boys' and girls' residences at Teen Challenge, each with a capacity of 20. Ages range from 15 to 25. Ten of the present 20 girl residents—all under 18—are "hardcore addicts," Miss Bachman stated.

The Young Great Society has a center for drug addicts in Mantua which has been in operation 15 months. There, a less dangerous drug, methadone is substituted for a more dangerous toxic one such as heroin.

Statistics to separate juveniles from adults have not been kept at this center, a spokesman said, "but we have treated over 1700 addicts in our 15 months."

During the last year, said Dr. Hawkins, 60 percent of his new male patients from 14 to 30 years of age have been drug addicts seeking help.

He disagrees with the methadone system, but administers large doses of tranquilizers to lessen the suffering during the withdrawal stage, almost enabling addicts to "sleep through" the worst part, he said.

Edward T. Kelly, regional director of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, a U.S. Justice Department agency, deals with sources rather than users, but said his observation leads him to believe use and addiction by juveniles and young adults may well have attained epidemic proportions here. He said he has noted "a definite increase in drug addiction among juveniles in a short period of time."

Kelly also said there is more heroin in the Philadelphia area now than last year. It has been coming here by way of New York from Europe, especially Marseilles France, he added.

WHERE HAVE ALL THE FLOWERS GONE?

Mr. HART. Mr. President, how many times must a nation be warned that it faces a society divided and torn?

How many times must we be told that men come in colors other than white?

How long must we ask that a black child be grateful to be told, "Don't believe them because they are lies"?

Mr. President, those are questions asked by a black who attended the recent gridiron dinner in Washington.

Those are questions any sensitive man must ask of a nation which, almost 200 years old, still refuses to ask where have all the flowers gone, still refuses to recognize that the missing flowers diminish each of us, each child, black or white.

The pen in the hands of a sensitive, wise man is still our best hope of healing the wounds which divide our Nation.

We should be grateful that men such as Roger Wilkins, a former Assistant Attorney General of the United States, has the patience to once more put pen to paper to remind us of what the Kerner Commission told us, of the future the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence predict for us.

There are no flowers for any of us in that future.

Mr. Wilkins reminded all of us, kind men, good men, warm men, that we are running out of times we can turn our head and pretend we just do not see.

To help us all see more clearly, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Wilkins' article entitled "A Black at the Gridiron Dinner," published in the Washington Post, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BLACK AT THE GRIDIRON DINNER

(By Roger Wilkins)

When it was all over, a number of men had tears in their eyes, even more had lifted hearts and spirits, but a few were so dispirited that they went upstairs to get drunk. We had just heard the President and Vice President of the United States in a unique piano duet—and to many old Gridiron Dinner veterans, it was a moving show-stopper. To a few others, it was a depressing display of gross insensitivity and both conscious and unconscious racism—further proof that they and their hopes for their country are becoming more and more isolated from those places where America's heart and power seem to be moving.

The annual dinner of the Gridiron Club is the time when men can put on white ties and tails and forget the anxiety and loneliness that are central to the human condition and look at other men in white ties and tails and know that they have arrived or are still there.

The guests are generally grateful and gracious. But the event's importance is beyond the structures of graciousness because it shows the most powerful elements of the nation's daily press and all elements of the nation's government locked in a symbiotic embrace. The rich and the powerful in jest tell many truths about themselves and about their country. I don't feel very gracious about what they told me.

Some weeks ago, to my surprise and delight, a friend—a sensitive man of honor—with a little half-apology about the required costume, invited me to attend the dinner.

The first impression was stunning: almost every passing face was a familiar one. Some had names that were household words. Some merely made up a montage of the familiar faces and bearings of our times. There were Richard Helms and Walter Mondale and Henry Kissinger and George McGovern and Joel Broyhill and Tom Wicker and William Westmoreland and John Mitchell and Tom Clark (ironically placed, by some pixie no doubt, next to each other on the dais) and Robert Finch and Ralph Nader, and of course, the President of the United States.

One thing quickly became clear about those faces. Apart from Walter Washington—who, I suppose, as Mayor had to be invited—mine was the only face in a crowd of some 500 that was not white. There were no Indians, there were no Asians, there were no Puerto Ricans, there were no Mexican-Americans. There were just the Mayor and me. Incredibly, I sensed that there were few in that room who thought tnat anything was missing.

There is something about an atmosphere like that that is hard to define, but excruciatingly easy for a black man to feel. It is the heavy, almost tangible, clearly visible, broad assumption that in places where it counts, America is a white country. I was an American citizen sitting in a banquet room in a hotel which I had visited many times. (My last occasion for a visit to that hotel was the farewell party for the white staff director and the black deputy staff director of the United States Commission on Civil Rights.) This night in that room, less than three miles from my home in the nation's capital, a 60 per cent black city, I felt out of place in America.

That is not to say that there were not kind men, good men, warm men in and around and about the party, nor is it to say that anyone was personally rude to me. There were some old friends and some new acquaintances whom I was genuinely glad to see. Ed Muskie who had given a very funny and exquisitely partisan speech (the Republicans have three problems: the war, inflation, and what to say on Lincoln's Birthday) was one of those. I was even warmly embraced by the Deputy Attorney General, Mr. Kleindienst, and had a long conversation with the associate director of the FBI, Mr. DeLoach.

But it was not the people so much who shaped the evening. It was the humor amidst that pervasive whiteness about what was going on in this country these days that gave the evening its form and substance. There were many jokes about the "Southern strategy." White people have funny senses of humor. Some of them found something to laugh about in the Southern strategy. Black people don't think it's funny at all. That strategy hits men where they live—in their hopes for themselves and their dreams for their children. We find it sinister and frightening. And let it not be said that the Gridiron Club and its guests are not discriminating about their humor. There was a real sensitivity about the inappropriateness of poking fun that night about an ailing former President, but none about laughing about policies which crush the aspirations of millions of citizens of this nation. An instructive distinction, I thought.

There was a joke about the amendments to the Constitution (so what if we rescind the First Amendment, there'll still be 25 left), and about repression (you stop bugging me, I'll stop bugging you), and there were warm, almost admiring jokes about the lady who despises "liberal Communists" and thinks something like the Russian Revolution occurred in Washington on November 15. There was applause—explosive and prolonged—for Judges Clement Haynsworth and Julius Hoffman (the largest hands of the evening by my reckoning).

As I looked, listened and saw the faces of those judges and of the generals and of the admirals and of the old members of the oligarchies of the House and Senate, I thought of the soft, almost beatific smile of Cesar Chavez; the serious troubled face of Vine Delora Jr., and the handsome, sensitive faces of Andy Young and Julian Bond of Georgia. All those men and more have fought with surely as much idealism as any general ever carried with him to Saigon, with as much courage as any senator ever took with him on a fact-finding trip to a Vietnam battlefield, or even as much hope, spirit and belief in the American dream as any Peace Corps kid ever took to the Andes in Peru. But the men I have named fought for American freedom on American soil. And they were not there. But Julius Hoffman was.

As the jokes about the "Southern strategy" continued, I thought about the one-room segregated schoolhouse where I began my education in Kansas City. That was my neighborhood school. When they closed it, I was bused—without an apparent second thought—as a 5-year-old kindergartener, across town to the black elementary school. It was called Crispus Attucks.

And I thought of the day I took my daughter when she was seven along the Freedom Trail, in Boston, and of telling her about the black man named Crispus Attucks who was the first American to die in our revolution.

And I remember telling her that white America would try very hard in thousands of conscious and unconscious ways both to make her feel inferior. And I remember the part in building America's greatness and to make her feel inferior. And I remember the profoundly moving and grateful look in her eyes and the wordless hug she gave me when I told her, "Don't you believe them because they are lies." And I felt white America in that room in the Statler Hilton telling me all those things that night, and I told myself, "Don't you believe them because they are lies."

And when it came to the end, the President and the Vice President of the United States, in an act which they had consciously worked up, put on a Mr. Bones routine about the Southern strategy with the biggest boffo coming as the Vice President affected a deep Southern accent. And then they played their duets—the President playing his songs, the Vice President playing "Dixie," the whole thing climaxed by "God Bless America" and "Auld Lang Syne." The crowd ate it up. They roared. As they roared I thought that after our black decade of imploring, suing, marching, lobbying, singing, rebelling, praying and dying we had come to this: a Vice Presidential Dixie with the President as his straight man. In the serious and frivolous places of power—at the end of that decade—America was still virtually lily white. And most of the people in that room were reveling in it. What, I wondered, would it take for them to understand that men also come in colors other than white. Seeing and feeling their blindness, I shuddered at the answers that came most readily to mind.

As we stood voluntarily, some more slowly than others, when the two men began to play God Bless America, I couldn't help remembering Judy Collins (who could not sing in Chicago) singing "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?"

So, later, I joined Nick Kotz, author of "Let Them Eat Promises" and we drank down our dreams.

I don't believe that I have been blanketed in and suffocated by such racism and insensitivity since I was a sophomore in college when I was the only black invited to a minstrel spoof put on at a white fraternity house.

But then, they were only fraternity brothers, weren't they?

RETIRED GENERALS SPEAK ON VIETNAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, four distinguished retired generals have made timely and perceptive statements about the war in Vietnam. Two of these generals, David M. Shoup and Samuel B. Griffith II, have appeared in recent years as witnesses before the Foreign Relations Committee.

These statements by experienced and outstanding former members of the armed forces are relevant to our present difficulties and I urge Senators to take note of their views.

I ask unanimous consent that statements as they appear in the publication Lithopinion be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lithopinion, spring 1970]

BEYOND THE CALL OF DUTY

When is a peacenik not a peacenik? When is a hawk not a hawk? The bitter debate over our commitment to the war in Vietnam has resulted in stereotypes that make rational discussion of the conflict virtually impossible. Everyone who opposes the war has been pigeonholed as a "peacenik"—which, in the judgment of most people who use the term, is usually supposed to mean someone less patriotic than he should be. And everyone who favors our participation in the war is pigeonholed as a "hawk"—which, in the judgment of most people who use the term, is usually supposed to mean someone who is willing to drop hydrogen bombs to get it over with.

Lithopinion takes pleasure in disrupting these sterotypes by presenting a gallery of hawks who are peaceniks—that is, professional warriors of the highest reputation who believe this particular war is a stupid ordeal to which we have subjected our young men and our energies and finances long enough. In previous wars involving the protection of this country, they were the fiercest of hawks. But in this conflict, for reasons they will explain, they advise the sheathing of talons.

We recommend that special attention be given the opening article, written specifically at the invitation of Lithopinion, in which Brigadier General Samuel B. Griffith II, United States Marine Corps, Retired, urges unilateral withdrawal, if necessary—a unique and brave suggestion in itself; further, he explodes the domino theory which holds that if South Vietnam falls, all Asia will fall under the domination of Communist China. General Griffith argues that China is surrounded by hostile forces which are sufficient to contain her and, coincidentally, to explain her belligerent posture.

General Griffith, twice decorated with the nation's second highest medal for heroism, retired in 1956. As a member of the 1st Marine Raiders during World War II, he earned the Navy Cross and Purple Heart at Guadalcanal and the Army Distinguished Service Cross at New Georgia. After his retirement he received a Doctorate in Chinese Military History from Oxford (New College) in 1961. His latest book is The Battle for Guadalcanal, one of Lippincott's Famous Battles of History series. He has served as a research fellow in China studies at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York City. He is also a member of the Institute on Strategic Studies, London. As a recognized expert in Chinese and other Asian affairs, he has written for The New Yorker, The Saturday Evening Post, and Foreign Affairs. He has frequently lectured at the Armed Forces Staff College, Vassar College, the U.S. Naval War College, and West Point. He graduated from Annapolis in 1929. The citation for the Navy Cross reads in part: "On Sept. 27, 1942, with the only other field officer of the battalion killed that morning, and with his men greatly outnumbered and almost completely surrounded, Lt. Col. Griffith moved forward to a position where he could reconnoiter the ground in front of him in order to effectively employ the troops under his command. While in this position he was painfully wounded by an enemy sniper bullet. Refusing to relinquish command of his troops or leave them without a field officer to control the situation he returned to his post and personally directed the movements of the battalion throughout the remainder of that afternoon." The Army DSC, for action from July 7–10, 1943, on New Georgia, reads in part: "Lt. Col. Griffith frequently went alone on reconnaissance through areas covered by enemy fire as he skillfully led his battalion in its advance through swamp and dense jungle to its objective. Although his men had been without food or water for 36 hours, his fervent leadership infused them with fresh energy to deliver paralyzing blows in the final assault, during which four naval guns were seized and 350 of the enemy were killed." On his return to the U.S. he served as commanding officer of the candidate school at Quantico. Then he became commanding officer of the 21st Marines. The following is Griffith's thinking about America and Asia.

FOR BETTER OR FOR WORSE, the United States is a Pacific power, and will remain one for the indeterminate future. For this reason, our frustrating, bloody and costly experience in Vietnam imperatively dictates that President Nixon and his policy advisers give immediate priority to dispassionate and objective reassessment of United States security interests in Asia.

It should now be painfully apparent, even to the most belligerent and vociferous "hawks," that this nation, rich and powerful as it is, cannot afford a repetition of the Vietnam adventure, either in Southeast Asia or elsewhere.

Had such a realistic evaluation been made, even as late as early 1965, there is at least a good chance that the nation would have been spared the tragedy of the last five years. For there can be no question that any such appraisal would have emphatically indicated that American security interests in Vietnam were at best marginal, and could not possibly justify major commitment to a costly, protracted guerrilla-type war in the jungles, swamps and paddy fields of this small, poor, underdeveloped and strategically insignificant country on the rimland of Asia.

But for three full years after he launched the bombing campaign against the north, a campaign designed by "air power" proponents to hammer Ho Chi Minh's government into submission and force Hanoi to accept dictated negotiations, President Johnson unfailingly responded to his field commanders' unceasing requests for more ground combat troops, more artillery, more planes, more helicopters—in fact, "more" of everything. And so the inconclusive war, which ravaged South Vietnam, disintegrated the fabric of its society, and dangerously polarized our own, dragged on.

ESCALATION CLOSED THE DOOR

During this time, Washington's thesis was that the preservation of South Vietnam as an independent non-Communist state was a matter of vital concern to us. Why this was so was never satisfactorily explained to the American people, who were constantly assured that the North Vietnamese threat to overthrow the inept, oppressive and corrupt government in Saigon would soon be beaten back. This assertion could always be substantiated by the contents of "captured documents," by Viet Cong defections, by prisoner interrogation, by "kill ratios." There was always "light at the end of the tunnel."

The Johnson thesis was not successfully challenged until the early spring of 1968, when the pressure of events made it inescapably apparent, even to an obdurate President determined to "nail the coonskin to the wall," that he had gradually led the nation into an untenable position; that the passage of time, our increasing involvement, and the consequent escalation of violence by both sides, had closed out alternative courses of action, and that no viable option remained but disengagement, negotiated if possible, unilateral if not.

President Nixon, who came to office unencumbered with the emotional fixation that held his predecessor in thrall, appreciated the fact that winding down the war was an urgent political necessity. He has, in fact, settled for what he optimistically hopes will be a stalemate.

At the same time, he has tried to make it clear that while the United States will assist Southeast Asian nations to repel external aggression, he does not propose to commit this nation again to a major land war in Asia. This is, of course, the bare bones of an Asian policy, which must be fleshed out in more specific terms.

THE COLLISION OF FEARS

During the coming decades, the major power factor in the Asian equation will be the People's Republic of China, and any realistic reevaluation of our Asian security interests must take into account Peking's estimation of her own. Unfortunately, her conception of necessary security and our conception are almost entirely incompatible.

To appreciate this, one must look at the Asian environment in which China will be required to operate, not from the point of view of Foggy Bottom, but as it is seen by those who make policy in Peking. This environment—which decisively affects Peking's official pronouncements, her propaganda themes for internal and external consumption, and her domestic and foreign policy lines—appears to her to be essentially hostile and threatening.

Deterioration of the transitory fraternal Sino-Soviet relationship has probably reached the point of no return. Certainly, events of the past decade have exorcised the disturbing spectre of a monolithic Eurasian Communism directed from the Kremlin. What we see now is a clash of nationalisms, which neither adversary bothers any longer to disguise in ideological terminology. Each side dislikes, distrusts and fears the other.

Along 4500 miles of a disputed northern border, the Soviet Union has deployed powerful ground, air, rocket, armored and airborne forces poised to strike at China's burgeoning nuclear installations in the western province of Sinkiang and to attack her vulnerable and irreplaceable heavy industrial complexes in the three northeastern provinces (Tung-pei).

USSR AND USA "IMPERIALISM"

The Chinese response to this show of force, with its incipient threat, has been to charge that the "socialist imperialists" (the USSR) and the "capitalist imperialists" (the USA) are "colluding to isolate and contain China." Fanciful as this charge may appear to be in both Washington and Moscow, the danger seems very real to the Party's Military Affairs Commission (MAC) in Peking, which has recently ordered the armed forces alerted, the militia into intensive training, and directed that a variety of passive defense measures be undertaken without delay. In fact, the People's Republic today is on a war footing, and is behaving as if a Russian attack were imminent.

Bordering the Yalu, south of Manchuria, lies North Korea, governed (or misgoverned) by an erratic dictator, Kim Il-sung, subservient to Moscow and since 1966 recipient of Soviet economic and military aid, and beneficiary of a bilateral defense treaty with the Soviet Union. This relationship does not conduce to allay Peking's apprehensions. Nor can she derive much comfort from Kim Il-sung's announced intent to unify Korea in the face of a known U.S. commitment to defend the integrity of the Republic of Korea.

Japan, another Asian ally of the United States, has made tremendous progress in every field. Her technological and industrial achievements during the past twenty years are equalled only by those of West Germany, and have made her the leading power in Asia, a position the Chinese aspire to attain for themselves. Here, as in South Korea, American atomic military power is deployed, alert to strike Chinese targets.

IT'S NOT TEMPTING CHINA

To the south lies Taiwan, bound to the United States by bilateral aid and defense treaties. Taiwan, considered a province of China by both Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and his enemy, Mao Tse-tung, is a galling thorn in Peking's side, and "liberation" of Taiwan has since 1949 been a priority policy objective of the mainland government. There is no possibility that this ambition can be realized so long as the United States continues to give its support to the Nationalists.

Further to the south, the Philippines, long considered by Peking a fertile ground for a "People's Liberation War," is tied by treaty to the U.S. and provides basing facilities for both the U.S. Navy and Air Force. There the government, suspicious of the resident Chinese minority and envious of its dominant position in the mercantile field, has taken suppressive measures to reduce its importance and influence.

Chinese reaction to the American presence in South Vietnam reflects a basic anomoly. For while Peking is anxious to see Party Chairman Mao Tse-tung's thesis on "Wars of National Liberation" ultimately confirmed there, and the Americans driven out, the Maoists who control policy are content to sit on the sidelines and contemplate with satisfaction the spectacle of America pouring resources into a war that doctrine correctly assured them the "Imperialists" could not win. History now confirms Mao Tse-tung's speculation to the effect that the Americans would eventually "get tired" in Vietnam and would "go away."

Hanoi, in desperate need of both Chinese and Soviet aid to prosecute the war in the south, is anxious to preserve political integrity and freedom of action. In this political balancing act, the North Vietnamese have found a responsive ally in the Soviet Union, which is quite as determined to contain the spread of Chinese influence in Asia as we are.

PEKING MISSES THE BOAT

For Peking, theoretically neutralized Laos is a question mark, as indeed it is for us. With continuing North Vietnamese infiltration, and the gradual spread of Pathet Lao control, it seems inevitable that a major portion of this politically confused nation, an artificial entity if there ever was one, will eventually be dominated by Hanoi. This will not necessarily be to Peking's advantage.

Cambodia, which fears both the Vietnamese and the Thais, also fears Chinese influence, however indirectly exerted. This fragile political structure, governed by the benevolent but wily and intensely nationalistic Sihanouk, might have been fair game for a Peking-engineered coup some years ago. The opportunity has passed.

Thailand, superficially secure from Chinese-inspired revolutionary machinations, has received considerable amounts of U.S. economic and military aid. Her hostility to China is as undisguised as are her pro-American sentiments. Here, the United States enjoys basing rights and deploys strategic aircraft capable of delivering nuclear weapons to any target in the People's Republic. A pro-Peking Thai National Liberation Front operates in the northern provinces, but poses no real threat to the government in Bangkok.

Burma has had her own experience with the militant Maoist, but whether she will be able to maintain her independent position is an open question. She is a susceptible target for a Chinese-supported "War of Liberation."

REDS GOOF IN INDOCHINA

South of the Himalayan arc lies a hostile India, recipient of economic and military aid both from the U.S. and the USSR and deeply suspicious of Peking and Peking's friend. India's enemy, Pakistan. The three tiny and militarily impotent Himalayan states. Nepal, Bhutan and Sikkim, could not resist Peking if she should decide to take them over. Nor could India protect them.

Elsewhere in Asia, Peking has no friends. The attempted coup in Indonesia (which she certainly inspired, but probably did not trigger), ruptured the Peking-Djakarta axis and resulted in a bloody shambles in which tens of thousands of pro-Maoists were exterminated. The Chinese were quick to accuse the CIA of promoting this blood bath, which wrote finis to Peking's efforts to acquire an ally whose unique strategic position would have immeasurably enhanced Chinese potential to affect the course of Asian history to her advantage.

The expressed or implied hostility of the great majority of her neighbors, most of whom are supported by the United States, is not the only factor that the Chinese must take into account as they assess the Asian environment. For over the eastern horizon the U.S. Seventh Fleet, a nuclear-armed striking force, cruises, and in the depths Polaris submarines, with missiles targeted, wait.

BASICALLY, CHINA IS PRUDENT

The Chinese are unable to influence this environment in any substantive way. This impotence, and the frustration it induces, are best reflected in the bellicose verbal barrages directed against both the Soviet Union and the United States. But, despite the ferocious rhetoric, Peking's policy has on the whole been distinguished by a realistically prudent assessment of her own vulnerabilities and of the overwhelming strength of her adversaries.

Peking's policy has been, and for a long time to come will continue to be, the avoidance of a direct confrontation with either the U.S. or Soviet Union. But she will certainly encourage, and where possible support, proxy "Wars of National Liberation" in the areas she defines as "Storm Centers of World Revolution," i.e., Asia, Africa and Latin America. This is a "low risk" policy which at the very least will discomfort the United States and which may produce disproportionate dividends.

China's belligerent propaganda, combined with our own cumulative frustration in Vietnam, impelled the Johnson administration in late 1967 to try to persuade the American people that Peking, not Hanoi, was our real enemy. The President viewed with horror the prospect of the Chinese swallowing Hawaii and taking over California; his Secretary of State conjured the fearsome picture of "a billion Chinese . . . armed with nuclear weapons," and the Vice President pointed to Peking as "headquarters" of a militant, aggressive Asian Communism determined to overrun Southeast Asia.

FIRST THINGS FIRST IN CHINA

It is certainly true that by 1980 there will be a billion Chinese, and that Peking will then have at its disposal a nuclear arsenal, given peace in Asia. The prospect of Chinese armadas headed for San Francisco is of course pure fantasy, and whether Peking is "headquarters" of an "Asian-Communist Movement" determined to capture Southeast Asia is at least arguable.

In this context, it may be relevant to point out that Peking has profound, complex and possibly insoluble domestic problems that will require her urgent attention and absorb her energies for some considerable time to come. She has not now, nor will she have in the foreseeable future, the military capability to "overrun" Southeast Asia.

Nevertheless, geographic propinquity, historical association and many cultural similarities account for a legitimate Chinese interest in Southeast Asia. No Peking government would be happy to see United States influence paramount in the area while its own was completely excluded. This is not to imply that I believe the Chinese will attempt to "take over" that part of the continent by force of arms. But it can mean in the future a continuing and frequently abrasive political, psychological and economic struggle between China and the United States. It will be a problem for both to keep this struggle within bounds, for there can be no military solution.

It seems clear that any realistic reevaluation of American security interests in Asia will clearly indicate which areas, if any, are truly vital, which important, which marginal and which unimportant. Our problem has been a failure to discriminate. It was this failure that drew the nation step by step into the morass of Vietnam, from which President Nixon is now attempting to gradually extricate us. This will be a prolonged process, and will require patient determination—not, unfortunately an American characteristic.

MAOISM ISN'T "WAVE OF FUTURE"

The primary definition of the word vital as given in the Funk and Wagnalls Standard College Dictionary is: "necessary to existence of continuance; essential." It taxes the imagination to conceive that the continuance of our free American society could depend on the existence of an artificial state in South Vietnam. Yet this was the conviction that obsessed President Johnson, and the loaded phrase "vital security interest" was repeatedly used by administration spokesmen to justify a course of action that became daily less acceptable to the American people.

We do, of course, have important interests in Asia. It is to our best interest to encourage the development there of stable, viable, democratic societies capable of protecting themselves against internal subversion by parties either of the left or the right. But we have learned, or should have, that massive intervention is not the answer. We may indeed ask whether a society unable or unwilling to protect itself from subversion is worth a salvage effort, particularly if that effort threatens in the process to tear our own apart.

During the coming decade, China's capacity to directly influence the course of history in Asia will be negligible. Maoism has been rejected by every Asian nation, with the possible exceptions of North Korea and North Vietnam, as unsuitable and irrelevant. It is not "the wave of the future."

What Asian societies seek, and what we should assist them to find, is expression of their own, unique character. Japan has reached this point; India, Indonesia and some of the smaller nations are striving to reach it, and with our aid and encouragement, will.

It is equally to our interest to take steps that will allay Peking's apprehensions of our intentions. Neutralization of Southeast Asia, with both China and the United States among the guarantors, would be an important ultimate goal.

General David M. Shoup. U.S. Marine Corps, Retired. Among his decorations is the Congressional Medal of Honor, won for gallantry which, according to Pentagon sources, "was largely responsible for the final decisive defeat of the Japanese forces" at the bloody battle of Tarawa Atoll in 1943. His citation reads: "Although severely shocked by an exploding enemy shell soon after landing at the pier and suffering from a serious, painful leg wound which had become infected. Shoup fearlessly exposed himself to the terrific and relentless artillery, machinegun, and rifle fire from hostile shore emplacements. Rallying his hesitant troops by his own inspiring heroism, he gallantly led them across the fringing reefs to charge the heavily fortified island and reinforce our hard-pressed, thinly held lines. Upon arrival on shore, he assumed command of all landed forces and, working without rest under constant, withering enemy fire during the next two days, conducted smashing attacks against unbelievably strong and fanatically defended Japanese positions despite innumerable obstacles and heavy casualties." Under Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy, Shoup was commandant of the Marine Corps. Kennedy referred to him as "my Marine." Here is Shoup on the Vietnam war:

"In all of my studies and all of my associations over the years with hundreds of flag officers of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines, always the conclusion after every study, every discussion was that under no circumstances should we get engaged in a land warfare in South Asia, in Asia, on the Asian mainland. If my memory serves me as well as I hope it does, in addition to those people I have personally heard three Presidents say the same thing, and yet there we are, bogged down in the same manner that had been predicted over the last 25 years at least by all those military people who studied the situation and who advised against it.

"When we were in Laos, this same thing [getting bogged down in a land war] would have happened except it was a provable situation that we could not logistically support the number of armed forces organization that would be required to fight this out in Laos. We couldn't do it. But then the next time a confrontation possibility came to pass, and we had the seashore on our flank, increasing our capabilities of logistics support, we went right at it. I do not know why.

"The first reason we were given for being in South Vietnam was so that the South Vietnamese might determine their own destiny without outside interference, and at the very time this was given as a reason the people we were fighting were almost 99 percent South Vietnamese.

"It has always been my contention that this was a civil war amongst South Vietnamese, and if we leave them alone to solve their own problems in the manner that they want to solve them they would be proud of their solution, support whatever conclusions they finally came to, and go ahead in the business of being a nation. Instead of winning the minds and hearts of the South Vietnamese, we have rather closed their minds and broken their hearts. There is a great deal of that. They don't like us meddling in their business and they don't like us trying to tell them what kind of a house they ought to live in, what kind of bandage they ought to put on their foot, and all the rest of it. They would like to live the way they want to live.

"The second reason we were given for being in South Vietnam was that if we don't stop them there, the Communists will soon attack Pearl Harbor or crawl up the beaches of Los Angeles. It is ludicrous to think that just because we lose in South Vietnam that very soon somebody is going to be knocking at the doors of Pearl Harbor. The third reason we were given was the containment of China. Although the United States has an interest in what happens in Vietnam and other parts of Southeast Asia, it is not vital to the security of the United States.

"You cannot defeat the armed forces of North Vietnam—which is the nation we are at war with, whether declared or not—by winning, so-called, in South Vietnam. It is not possible because the big army of North Vietnam is not there. If you poured sufficient troops in and if you also violated the sovereignty of Laos and Cambodia, you could probably drive the North Vietnamese out of South Vietnam in time. But even then you have not defeated the nation or the armed forces of the nation. If we invade North Vietnam with an idea of defeating militarily the armed forces of that nation, and by such action the Chinese Armed Forces come into the war on an all-out basis we cannot win a ground warfare against China without nuclear weapons.

"What do we win if we win? The gain, no matter how greatly it may be embellished, will never equal one/one-thousandth of the cost.

"Have we during this conflict, except indirectly, harmed the two great Communist—so-called Communist—powers? Have we caused them any problems? Very few. And are those two great Communist nations causing us trouble? If they are, we are not harming them. They are harming us by using up our men, money and materials.

"As for China, from my experiences over parts of five years in China and what I know of conditions there today, I'm sure that more Chinese know where tomorrow's food is coming from than ever in the history of living man. And to what must go the credit? The system they're serving under. The alienation of the friendship of the great and wonderful Chinese people will surely vie for decades to come as the greatest blunder this country ever made in her relations with other nations, unless the final results from our Vietnam commitment overshadow it."

Brigadier General Robert L. Hughes, U.S. Army, Retired. A member of General MacArthur's staff in World War II, he wears the Silver Star, Bronze Star with Oak Leaf Cluster, Combat Infantry Badge, and Purple Heart (he was badly wounded on New Guinea). Hughes, on the Vietnam war:

"Those who have died in Vietnam have died in support of an unstable foreign government that is maintained only by the strength of the United States . . . We are prosecuting an immoral war in support of a government that is a dictatorship by design. It represents nothing but a ruling clique and is composed of morally-corrupt leaders who adhere to a warlord philosophy.

"We are losing the flower of American youth in a war that could stretch into perpetuity. We cannot be sure of the security of villages three miles from Saigon because we can't tell the good guys from the bad guys. This is one hell of a war to be fighting. We must disengage from this tragic war. There is not a piece of real estate over there that has any particular strategic value to the U.S."

Brigadier General William Wallace Ford, U.S. Army, Retired. He is one of the few who can say that he fought every day of both World War I and World War II. In the second of these conflicts, he was artillery commander of the 88th Division as it slugged its way across France, Belgium and Germany. Says General Ford:

"In my judgment, the war in Vietnam is wrong politically, militarily and morally. On the foreign side it is isolating us from the sympathies of most of the world. The countries of Europe, to whose support we rallied in two World Wars, now either openly condemn us or turn their heads as in shame and embarrassment for a friend who has committed an ignoble act.

"This war is wrong politically because it seeks to fight ideas with bullets. We must find better ways to fight Communism than by trying to shoot it out of a country where it seems to have more appeal than what we offer here at home. This effort to impose our style of government and society upon a little undeveloped country, half-way around the world, which clearly has no enthusiasm for it, is an exercise in the arrogance of power which has brought down great empires. It will bring us down if we persist.

"This war is wrong militarily because it runs the risk of involving us in a great land war in Asia, which we could not possibly win, or, worse yet, a nuclear war, which no one could win.

"This war is wrong morally because it violates our basic doctrine as to self-determination by peoples, violates sober international commitments, offers to the world and to ourselves excuses which cannot bear the light of examination, and forces into its support vast numbers of our people who believe it wrong and suffer an agony of conscience.

"The most unbearable cost is that the war in Vietnam is shattering the unity of our nation. By coercing into support of the war vast numbers of people who have strong conscientious objections to it, by drafting their sons and brothers and husbands to kill and be killed against their profound convictions, we are doing injury to our national spirit that will be difficult to repair.

"Well, what to do? How do we get out of this mess?

"The way to stop the war is simply to stop fighting. Let us not worry about losing face in offering peace. France was in almost exactly the same position in Algeria some years ago, but finally decided that her effort was not only wrong, but futile. She got out. No one has reviled her for her action. Russia overplayed her hand in Cuba, and was forced to withdraw. No one calls Russia a paper tiger.

"Nations all over the earth have dreamed great dreams around the American Image. For their sake, but even more for ours, let us hope they will again."

ANALYSIS OF JUDGE CARSWELL'S RECORD

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, the Ripon Society and the Law Students Concerned for the Courts yesterday released the most thorough analysis yet presented of Judge Harrold Carswell's judicial record.

A earlier study prepared by these groups had been criticized by the Justice Department as "unreliable" because it included only Judge Carswell's published opinions and excluded his unpublished ones. In response, these young lawyers conducted a survey of every appeal to the fifth circuit between the years 1959 and 1969—nearly 7,000 cases.

Mr. President, I believe that the results of this study cast grave doubt on the qualification of Judge Carswell for the High Court. Of the 122 cases—reported and unreported—decided by Judge Carswell over the 11-year period and appealed to the fifth circuit, over 40 percent were reversed. Of the 67 district court judges in the fifth circuit with 20 or more decisions appealed, Judge Carswell ranks 61st—that is, in the bottom 10 percent—in rate of affirmance.

But the most startling fact revealed by this study is that Judge Carswell's performance worsens as time goes on. Grouping his decisions chronologically, the judge was reversed on 25 percent of his first 30 appeals, 33 percent of the next 30 appeals, 48 percent on the next 31 appeals, and 53 percent of the last 31 appeals. This compares to an average rate of reversals for all fifth circuit district judges varying only slightly over the 11-year period from a high of approximately 30 percent to a low of 23 percent.

I do not believe the Senate should confirm for the Supreme Court the nomination of a man with such an undistinguished record. And I am deeply troubled at the concept of a Supreme Court Justice who is increasingly unable to follow existing precedent—increasingly determined to impose his own views of the law in the face of superior decisions to the contrary. I cannot believe that the Senate can support for the Supreme Court a judge who not only has a mediocre record, but who becomes less and less able the longer he serves on the bench.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire analysis by the Ripon Society and Law Students Concerned for the Court be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF JUDGE CARSWELL'S RECORD

The following is a brief summary of the purpose, methods, and results of a study of the judicial record of Judge G. Harrold Carswell by the Law Students Concerned For the Court.

I. PURPOSE

The Law Students Concerned for the Court released a statistical study of the judicial record of Judge Carswell at a press conference in Washington, D.C. on March 5. The study used five objective criteria to compare the record of Judge Carswell with that of the other judges in the 5th Circuit District Courts and the District Judges of the country as a whole. Probably the most important criteria was the reversal rate of those decisions appealed from Judge Carswell's 84 opinions printed in F. Supp. Of these decisions, 17 were appealed and 10 were reversed—a rate of 58.8%—almost three times the national average. This result was disregarded by a Justice Department spokesman as unreliable since it represented only a small portion of Judge Carswell's total record. (Washington Post, 3/6, p. A–15.)

This response led the Law Students Concerned for the Court to issue a challenge to Attorney General John Mitchell. The challenge was a request that the Attorney General publicly set a minimum standard of ranking by reversal rate which a nominee to the Supreme Court ought to have. The challenge was issued in a letter to the Attorney General which was also released to the press on March 11. (See Attachment No. 1) In accordance with this challenge, the Law Students vowed to examine every 5th Circuit appellate decision for the last twelve years in order to record every single appeal from Judge Carswell's decisions as a District Judge thereby setting forth the complete record as apparently required by the Justice Department.

While no response to the challenge was received, the Law Students proceeded with their second study. The results, we think, add new substance to the record of Judge Carswell. While they are most consistent with the previous statistical study and with the statements of Dean Bok of Harvard, Dean Pollak of Yale, and Prof. Van Alstyne of Duke, among many who have registered their dissent to this nomination, this new study is revealing in its own right. The results strongly indicate that Judge Carswell most assuredly fails to present the credentials expected of a Supreme Court nominee—and in fact, is quite far removed from such credentials.

II. METHODS

This study includes an examination of every 5th Circuit appellate decision beginning with volume 252 of the Federal Reporter, Second Series, and continuing up to volume 419, the most recent one. Every 5th Circuit decision was recorded on a card, as was the name of the District judge who wrote the opinion from which the appeal was taken. Only those decision for which a District judge was named, which included almost all of them) were recorded. Appellate rulings on decisions by administrative agencies (eg NLRB) were disregarded.

The appellate rulings were tabulated in three categories: (1) affirmances, (2) reversals, and (3) those affirmed in part and reversed in part. Judgments vacated were treated as reversals. Whenever necessary the appellate decision was closely read in order to determine whether the decision below was essentially affirmed or reversed.

The study was basically looking to see if the ruling on a point of law by the District judge was allowed to stand by the Court of Appeals. Every effort was made to fairly place a decision in one of the above categories Judgments modified were not recorded as such, although if the modification was clearly a reversal then it was placed in that category.

Appellate decisions were all shepardized although only those rulings amounting to an affirmance or reversal or part thereof were counted. "Cert. Denied," "U.S. Appeal Pending" and "modified" (unless dispositive) were not recorded. Shepardizing being completed, the decisions were then sorted and tabulated by the judge using the three categories mentioned.

III. RESULTS

A. Reversal record

Judge Carswell had 122 decisions appealed to the Fifth Circuit or the Supreme Court. 70 of these were affirmed—46 were reversed—with 6 being affirmed in part/reversed in part. Judge Carswell's reversal rate was 40.2% applying our method of giving each reversal in part the value of one-half a full reversal (with the affirmed in part likewise counting for one-half.) This method of treating AIP/RIP results was judged to be most representative and a fair one. Judge Carswell's reversal rate is almost a full ten percent greater than the Fifth Circuit District Judge average as a whole of 30.0%.

B. Percentile rank of Judge Carswell by reversal rate

Looking at all Fifth Circuit District Judges with 20 or more decisions appealed, Judge Carswell ranked in the lowest 10% of reversal rates (i.e. having one of the highest rates). He stands 61 out of 67 judges in order of increasingly high reversal rates. Among those judges with 30 or more and 50 or more decisions appealed, Judge Carswell ranked in the lowest 15% of District judges in the Fifth Circuit. Among judges with 75 or more, and 100 or more decisions appealed, Judge Carswell ranked in the bottom quarter. He stands well below the median in all categories.

C. A chronological look at Judge Carswell's reversal rate

Judge Carswell's record shows an increasing number of reversals, the longer he sat on the District bench.

Among his first 61 opinions there were 42 affirmances, 18 reversals, and 1 AIP/RIP for a reversal rate of 30.0%. Among his next 62 opinions, there were 28 affirmances, 28 reversals, and 5 AIP/RIP which gave him a reversal trend of 50.0%.

Dividing Judge Carswell's opinions into fourths, the pattern becomes clearer. The number of his reversals increases steadily from 7 to 10 to 13 to 16 while the number of affirmances decreases. The reversal rate increases from 25% to 33% to 48% to 53% for the last thirty-one decisions appealed

LAW STUDENTS CONCERNED FOR THE COURT, COLUMBIA LAW SCHOOL,
New York, N.Y., March 11, 1970.

Hon. JOHN MITCHELL,
Justice Department,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: In response to the Justice Department's criticism that this group's statistical study of Judge Carswell judicial record is invalid because it considers only his printed decisions, this letter both defends the findings announced last Thursday and respectfully challenges you to agree to recommend withdrawing his name if his total record is found to fall below the percentile of judges—which you are hereby asked to designate in advance—who alone should be appropriately considered for elevation to the Supreme Court.

In order to avoid the slightest question regarding sampling, this group hereby commits itself to perform such a further study, certified under oath, by devoting whatever time and manpower is necessary to consider every single decision, published or unpublished, by Judge Carswell and every other district judge between 1958 and the present which was appealed in the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. We submit that you cannot in good faith continue to recommend that Judge Carswell sit in judgment on the highest court if his record on the lowest federal court does not meet the level which you deem to be appropriate.

As you recall, our group found that Judge Carswell ranked far below the average of all other federal judges on each statistical criterion which was applied to all of his 84 printed decisions and to a sample of 400 printed decisions of other judges. The findings we released last Thursday at our press conference together with the Ripon Society at the New Senate Office Building showed:

1. Carswell was reversed on 58.8% of the appeals from all of his printed decisions, which is practically 3 times the 20.2% average for all federal district judges and 2½ times the 24.0% for district judges in the Fifth Circuit.

2. As a percentage of all his printed decisions, Carswell's rate of reversal was still twice as high as both the national and Fifth Circuit district judge average, 11.9% as against 5.3% and 6.0%, respectively.

3. Throughout the period he sat, Judge Carswell's decisions were accorded relatively little authoritative weight by other judges: each of his opinions was cited by all other U.S. judges less than half as often, on the average, as those of all district judges and Fifth Circuit district judges.

4. Carswell's opinions were about two-fifths as thoroughly documented with case authority, and less than one-third with secondary source authority, as the average of all district judges.

5. Carswell's average opinion was less than half as extensive as the average for all other district judges.

A spokesman for your Department questioned the reliability of our findings on Judge Carswell's performance because they were based only on his printed decisions. He said: "No affirmance-reversal statistics based on that small a portion of any judge's decisions are reliable, even assuming the raw figures to be accurate." As to that final little innuendo, incidentally, our work sheets were and remain open to the inspection of both the press and your office and we trust that if you seriously question the accuracy of our raw figures you will produce those you believe to be correct.

Printed decisions, as you are surely aware, constitute a judge's principal—and indeed his only visible—contribution to the law. Further, judges select for publication in Federal Supplement (and West Publishing Co. additionally requests) decisions of more than routine nature—those of some importance, interest or novelty. The overwhelming majority of cases which judges elect not to publish, West has told us, are ordinary judgments upon jury trials, orders and decisions turning on questions of fact rather than on serious questions of law.

In view of those circumstances, and in fact that the work of a Supreme Court Justice is deciding and explaining not ordinary questions of law and fact but important questions of law which are novel and unsettled, how can your Department maintain that Judge Carswell's entire printed record of 84 decisions is an unreliable basis for measuring his judicial performance? President Nixon asked the Senate to "look at his record . . . as a Federal judge," and Senator Ervin has said, "I think we can judge a man's judicial past on the basis of the opinions he has written." If we cannot depend on the entire printed record, what can we depend on? Moreover, on what basis have you recommended his nomination?

Although we have confidence in the accuracy of our earlier findings that Judge Carswell falls drastically below the average level of performance of federal judges, we respectful extend to you the challenge mentioned above: Tell us the percentile of federal judges—top 2%, top 10%, top 25%, whatever—which you think should alone be considered for possible elevation to the Supreme Court. We will examine every one of the ten or fifteen thousand Fifth Circuit and Supreme Court decisions on appeals from decisions, printed or unprinted, of district judges in Judge Carswell's Fifth Circuit. We will preserve a card record of each case and certify under oath as to our methods and results. Judge Carswell's complete record on appeals will be measured against the complete record of each other judge during the same period.

Let the total record be determinative. Commit yourself to recommend Judge Carswell's withdrawal if his record fails to meet that which you designate in advance as a minimum standard. As a Supreme Court Justice he would be called upon to decide wisely those most complicated questions with few clear guideposts and with strongly competing principles which constitute the Court's work. You must certainly agree that as a district judge, charged with the duty of finding and applying better demarcated law on more elementary issues, Judge Carswell must not have been found to have erred more consistently than that number of other judges which you deem appropriate.

We hope that you will accept our respectful challenge, and that we may have your early reply.

Respectfully yours,

ALAN C. ZETTERBERG,
(For the committee).

LOW CASELOAD, HIGH BACKLOG FURTHER EVIDENCE OF CARSWELL INADEQUACY

The "Reversal Trend" Graph [not printed in the RECORD] presents the most striking evidence of Judge Carswell's lack of legal accomplishment. The following facts illustrate that this reversal trend is no fluke.

1. Judge Carswell's rate of reversal on cases appealed dramatically increased during his tenure as Federal District Court Judge in the Fifth Circuit. In his first 30 appeals he was reversed on 25%. In his last 31 appeals, before his appointment to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, he was reversed on 53.2%.

2. Simultaneously, his caseload decreased and his backlog increased. His rate of appeals per thousand cases terminated rose almost parallel with the national average, and slightly more strikingly than the other judges of the Fifth Circuit District Courts.

A. CASELOAD (BASED ON NUMBER OF CASES COMMENCED)

Judge Carswell began with a caseload of 353 when he was appointed to the bench of the Northern District of Florida in 1958. In terms of caseload, he was 11th of 16 districts in that circuit. In 1966, he was 17th of 17 districts in the same circuit, and remained so through 1968, despite the fact that Winston G. Arnow was appointed as a second Federal District Judge in the Northern District of Florida. (In light of the consistently light caseload, it is interesting that another judge was appointed at all.)

B. APPEALS PER THOUSAND CASES TERMINATED

Judge Carswell's high reversal rate, it would seem, cannot be explained by any supposition that only his wrong decisions were appealed from. In fact, Judge Carswell was appealed from slightly more often than the average rate for all Fifth Circuit Districts from 1958 to 1969, and on a parallel with the national average during the same time period. It might be thought that with such a light caseload and with more time therefore to work on opinions, Judge Carswell's decisions would have been less frequently appealed.

C. BACKLOG (CASES APPROPRIATE FOR TRIAL AND PENDING)

In 1958, Judge Carswell inherited a backlog of 126 cases. By 1966, his caseload (353 in 1958) had shrunk to 193 (17th of 17 districts in the Fifth Circuit), but his backlog had risen to 282. By June 19, 1969, the date to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, with the appointment of a second judge in his Northern District of Florida, Judge Carswell's caseload was 160, but the backlog for the Northern District had dropped to 120. Furthermore, while the average caseload in Fifth Circuit District Courts was substantially higher than in Judge Carswell's court, the average backlog was lower. While the average caseload in Fifth Circuit District Courts increased, Judge Carswell's caseload decreased. While the average backlog in Fifth Circuit District Court decreased, Judge Carswell's backlog more than doubled.

CONCLUSION

In fiscal 1968, his last full year on the District Court, Judge Carswell handled 38% fewer cases than the average Federal District judge and 45% fewer cases than the average Federal District judges in his own Fifth Circuit. Nonetheless, Judge Carswell's civil cases, taking the median, were 75% more delayed in reaching trial than the United States average, and 133% more delayed than civil cases in the Fifth Circuit District Courts. Examining the most serious cases (those 10% delayed the longest), Judge Carswell's docket averaged 21% more delay than the national average and 42% more delay than the other Fifth Circuit District Court cases.

In light of these statistics, the assessment of mediocre is perhaps a charitable one. The statistics developed by the Law Students Concerned For the Court clearly reflect negatively on Judge Carswell's qualifications for the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court docket is well known to be most burdensome in terms of both caseload and complexity of issues presented.

It might also be pointed out that Canon Seven of the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Ethics states:

"A judge should be prompt in the performance of his judicial duties, recognizing that . . . habitual lack of punctuality on his part justifies dissatisfaction with the administration of the fusiness of the court."

Moreover, bearing in mind that 10% of the civil cases in Judge Carswell's court were more than 47 months old (3 yrs. 11 mos.) before they reached trial, it should be noted that the declared policy of the Federal Judiciary is that "every case pending three years or more and appropriate for trial be regarded as a judicial emergency."

These facts are uniquely relevant now, when the issues of law and order and due process are so important to the fabric of American life, when it is so important to restore confidence in the legal process.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS OF ASSISTANCE FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending question, which the clerk will state.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 514) to extend programs of assistance on elementary and secondary education, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BAYH. I yield.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of the nomination of Mr. George Harrold Carswell.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

In executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending business which the clerk will state.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of George Harrold Carswell to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate unanimously agreed to vote on April 6 on a motion to recommit the nomination of Judge Carswell, pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement as set forth on page 9314 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Pursuant to that unanimous-consent agreement, where there is reference to a motion to be made by the Senator from Indiana, with the understanding that the vote will come on April 6 on the motion to recommit, at this time I do hereby move that the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is in order.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, would that still be subject to a motion to table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the same conditions as set forth in the unanimous-consent agreement. That is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, since the conclusion of hearings and the report of the Judiciary Committee on the nomination of Judge Carswell to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, a number of additional questions have been raised concerning Judge Carswell's qualifications. These are questions which the Judiciary Committee did not have the opportunity to consider.

I refer particularly to the uncertainty which has arisen regarding the willingness—or lack of willingness—of Judge Carswell's colleagues on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals to endorse his nomination. The record, as we know, contains a letter from former Chief Judge Elbert P. Tuttle offering to testify on the nominee's behalf. This letter is also cited on page 5 of the committee's report. On March 17, the senior Senator from Maryland informed the Senate that he had received three telegrams from Judge Tuttle indicating that he was no longer prepared to testify in support of Judge Carswell. It is not clear why Judge Tuttle has changed his mind, although it would be useful to the Senate to have this explained before the nomination is brought to a vote.

According to television and press reports, another of Judge Carswell's colleagues, Judge John Minor Wisdom, actively opposes the nomination. According to these reports, Judge Wisdom blocked a letter of endorsement from the entire fifth court bench by advising his colleagues that, if such action were taken, he himself would send a personal letter to the Judiciary Committee opposing the nomination.

Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that I have great respect for the President's prerogative in the nomination of high officials in the judicial and especially the executive branches of our Government.

Officials in the executive have a direct responsibility to the Chief Executive and generally hold office at his pleasure. On the other hand, Justices of the Supreme Court are appointed for life, they usually serve long after the President has retired, and they have a constitutional responsibility to support, to defend, and to interpret the Constitution and not necessarily support the policies of any Chief Executive. Therefore, the Senate has a special responsibility to exercise its independent judgment in confirming a Justice of the Supreme Court.

Other questions have arisen which the Judiciary Committee did not have the opportunity to consider. There have been several allegations of bias against certain attorneys on Judge Carswell's part. The meaning of the endorsement of the nominee by the Federal Judiciary Committee of the American Bar Association has been called into question by a group of distinguished lawyers, including the president of the New York Bar Association and the deans of leading law schools. In addition, the press reported yesterday, I believe, that the Philadelphia Bar Association—I think unanimously—opposes this nominee. These developments, I again emphasize, have all occurred since the Committee on the Judiciary considered this nomination.

Mr. President, it is no fault of the Judiciary Committee, or of the nominee, that the matters were not brought forth for orderly, thorough examination before the nomination was reported to the Senate. Nonetheless, they raise questions which I—and, I would guess, other Members of the Senate—wish to have clarified before voting on the nomination. I would think it unfortunate if Senators were forced to rely on press reports, television interviews, and an incomplete correspondence for highly pertinent information on the merits of this nomination.

I should like to make it clear that I myself am undecided, as of now, how I will cast my vote. I most emphatically do not share the lack of enthusiasm in some circles for the appointment of a southern judge. I applaud and appreciate the President's reported desire to nominate a judge who would give the Court regional balance. There are many eminent jurists in the southern part of the United States, and I have the fullest confidence in the ability of any of a number of them to serve with distinction on the Supreme Court.

Nor do I share the distaste which I have heard expressed for a "strict constructionist." I have, indeed, welcomed reports that the President sought a nominee who would practice judicial restraint. There is much to be said for a stricter construction of the Constitution than has been in favor in recent years—in both domestic and, I might say, in foreign affairs. In short, Mr. President, I consider myself a strict constructionist, especially in regard to the effect of the Constitution with respect to this body in our governmental system.

On these and other grounds, I thought the President's first nomination a satisfactory one and I cast my vote in favor of Judge Haynsworth. Before voting on the present nominee, I would very much like to have further information on the questions which have arisen since the nomination was reported on February 27.

This information can best be provided through the orderly procedures of the Judiciary Committee. I intend to support, therefore, Mr. President, the motion that the nomination of Judge Carswell be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary for such further consideration and action as the committee and its chairman may think appropriate.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BAYH. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas; and I must say that, being a bit familiar with the currents that are running across the country, I salute him for such a courageous approach to this matter.

I thought the Senator from Arkansas made two salient points: First, to draw a distinction between the Presidential prerogative so far as appointing members of his administration—teammates, if you please—with whom he must work, on one hand, and the responsibility of initiating nominations to the Supreme Court of men who will be there long after any of us, either he or any of us in this body, have the opportunity to serve.

The second matter that I thought was appropriate was the fact that by recommittal, the Senator from Arkansas pointed out the fact that there is a continuing search right now to differentiate between fact and fiction, to try to find out what was said and what was not said, to try to refine into the most minute details all the facts involved in the judge's background and what his qualifications are.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article by Mr. John MacKenzie relative to one of these facts, quoting a distinguished attorney from Washington, Charles A. Horsky, who is a member of the ABA panel, and an article by Mr. Fred Graham in the New York Times yesterday, about certain facts relative to the golf course case that I think would be important for us all to study.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUSTICE RUTLEDGE'S SON QUESTIONS CARSWELL STAND; VOICES DOUBTS ON HIGH COURT NOMINEE'S STATEMENT ABOUT FORMING OF PRIVATE CLUB

(By Fred P. Graham)

WASHINGTON, March 24.—The credibility of Judge G. Harrold Carswell's testimony about his role in the formation of a segregated private golf club has become a major issue in the battle over confirmation of his nomination to the Supreme Court.

Senator Birch Bayh, Democrat, of Indiana, released today a telegram from Neal P. Rutledge, a Miami lawyer who is the son of the late Justice Wiley Rutledge of the Supreme Court. Mr. Rutledge questioned Judge Carswell's testimony that he had not heard that a reason for forming the private club to take over Tallahassee's golf facilities was to prevent desegregation of the facilities.

Judge Carswell was United States Attorney for the Tallahassee area in late 1955 and early 1956, when the country club was formed and acquired the municipal facilities. He is now a member of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

CALLED "COMMON KNOWLEDGE"

His signing of the club's charter of incorporation, in his capacity as an incorporator and a director, has been construed by his critics as an indication of segregationist sentiment. He has told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the segregation motive "was never mentioned to me—I didn't have it in my mind, that is for sure."

Mr. Rutledge declared in his telegram that he lived in Tallahassee during much of this period and that "it was common knowledge in the community there at that time, and especially among the members of the bar," that the dominant motive for forming the private club was to prevent desegregation.

"It is impossible for me to believe that any prominent member of the Tallahassee community at that time, such as then United States Attorney Carswell, was not fully aware" of this motive, Mr. Rutledge said.

Charles A. Horsky, a Washington lawyer who serves on the American Bar Association committee that found Judge Carswell "qualified" for the Supreme Court, has told friends and associates here that some of the nominee's testimony on Jan. 27 seemed inconsistent with a discussion the two men had the previous night.

Mr. Horsky reportedly went to Judge Carswell's hotel room the night of Jan. 26 to ask about the nominee's role in forming the club, which was not disclosed in the press until the next morning.

QUESTIONED BY COMMITTEE

According to Mr. Horsky's associates, who would not be quoted by name, Judge Carswell at first insisted that he had only contributed $100 to help improve the club's facilities.

Then Mr. Horsky reportedly spread copies of the incorporation documents on the bed and pointed out Judge Carswell's signature on them. Judge Carswell then reportedly conceded that he had been an incorporator.

Before the Senate Judiciary Committee the next morning, when he was first asked about the club, Judge Carswell appeared uncertain about his role in it. He testified he had "hurriedly" read the news accounts that morning and had asked someone to make a telephone call to get more facts.

"I can only speak upon my individual recollection of this matter," he said. He added, "I was never an officer or director of any country club anywhere."

Asked if he had served as a director, as alleged in the press, he answered, "No, sir; nor in any other official capacity."

Then Senator Roman L. Hruska, Republican of Nebraska, asked, "Were you an incorporator of that club, as was alleged in one of the accounts I read?"

"No, sir," Judge Carswell replied.

Later that morning, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, brandished what appeared to be a copy of a corporate charter and asked Judge Carswell, "Did you in fact sign the letter of incorporation?"

"Yes sir, I recall that," the nominee answered.

When Senator Kennedy asked what he recalled about it, Judge Carswell replied, "They told me when I gave them $100 that I had the privilege of being an incorporator. They might have put down some other title, as if you were potentate or something."

TESTIMONY OF JUDGE DISPUTED

(By John P. MacKenzie)

Supreme Court nominee G. Harrold Carswell told two American Bar Association representatives that he was an incorporator of a segregated Tallahassee country club on the night before he swore to the Senate that he had no such role.

The secret meeting in a Washington hotel on Jan. 26, which was acknowledged yesterday by authoritative sources in and out of the ABA, was followed within hours by a letter from the ABA's judiciary committee informing the Senate that Carswell was rated "qualified" for the court vacancy.

No one familiar with the meeting could account for Carswell's flat "No, sir" when he was asked under oath by Sen. Roman L. Hruska (R-Neb.) whether he had served in 1956 as an incorporator of the Capital City Country Club, thereby helping to convert a public facility to a private club at a time when the courts were ordering the desegregation of public golf courses.

The incorporation papers were uncovered by members of the Washington Research Project Action Council, a civil rights organization, Joseph L. Rauh Jr., co-chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which opposes Carswell, delivered copies to Charles A. Horsky, Washington lawyer and the District of Columbia member of the ABA's judiciary committee.

The full committee had met on Sunday, Jan. 25, but adjourned without announcing whether it rated the nominee qualified. The role of Judge Carswell in the country club episode reportedly was part of the committee's unfinished business.

Horsky and fellow committee member Norman P. Ramsey of Baltimore then located Carswell at a downtown hotel and showed him the documents.

Judge Carswell reportedly then acknowledged that he was one of the club's incorporators.

The committee's chairman, Lawrence E. Walsh of New York, confirmed yesterday that the meeting between Carswell and the two ABA representatives occurred. He refused to elaborate.

Reports of Carswell's involvement in the Tallahassee golf club's changeover from public to private facility were aired in the morning newspapers of Jan. 27, when Carswell's confirmation hearing began before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Carswell told the senators he had "read the story very hurriedly this morning," adding "I had someone else make a phone call to get some dates about this thing." He then flatly denied to Hruska that he had been an incorporator of the golf course.

Pressed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who was holding a copy of the incorporation papers, about whether he ever signed letters of incorporation, Carswell replied:

"Yes, I recall that," and went on to give this explanation:

"They told me when I gave them $100 (to help build a clubhouse) that I had the privilege of being called an incorporator. They might have put down some other title, as if you were a potentate or something. I don't know what it would have been."

Throughout his testimony Carswell, a 50-year-old judge of the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, repeated that he was among many Tallahassee residents solicited for a club refurbishing project that, so far as he knew, had no racial aspect.

Asked whether he had "any idea that that private club was going to be opened or closed" to Negroes. Carswell replied, "The matter was never discussed."

"What did you assume?" asked Kennedy.

"I didn't assume anything," the nominee replied. "I assumed that they wanted the $100 to build a clubhouse."

Did he think blacks could belong?

"Sir, the matter was never discussed at all."

Kennedy tried once more. "What did you assume, not what was discussed."

Carswell replied, "I didn't assume anything. I didn't assume anything at all. It was never discussed."

It was learned yesterday that the question of Carswell's candor with the Senate Judiciary Committee was discussed last month when the ABA group again took up the case. After a secret meeting that lasted several hours, the ABA reaffirmed unanimously its opinion that Carswell was qualified for the high court.

Mr. BAYH. I salute the Senator from Arkansas for this very courageous statement.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I join in the comments of the distinguished Senator from Indiana about the statement just made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

I, too, have felt very strongly, as the Senator knows, that there are certain matters in connection with this nomination which ought to be considered again by the Judiciary Committee; and I have therefore felt, as the Senator from Arkansas has stated, that that would be a proper course for the Senate to take.

I point out, as did the Senator from Indiana, that in addition to the matters which the Senator from Arkansas has mentioned, the matter of the Tallahassee golf course also has been of concern to me and I think might be considered further by the Judiciary Committee.

For those reasons, I hope that such a motion, when made, will prevail; and I agree with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I, too, salute the Senator from Arkansas for his statement, for his cautious approach to this nomination.

As a westerner, I want to say that I wholeheartedly concur with the right of the South to be represented on the Court, and with the right of the President to nominate a strict constructionist. I agree that there are many men in the South who are eminently qualified to serve on the Court, and I would be glad to support such a nomination.

At one point in his remarks, the Senator from Arkansas referred to reports that the Philadelphia Bar Association had gone on record against Judge Carswell. I would like to verify that they have indeed done so. I have in my hand—I will place it in the RECORD—the statement of the Philadelphia Bar Association against Judge Carswell. It was unanimous. According to the Philadelphia Enquirer, this is the first time that the Philadelphia Bar Association has gone on record in regard to a Supreme Court nomination. The San Francisco Bar Association, likewise, went on record a few days ago against the nomination.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not know that.

Mr. CRANSTON. These are two great American cities where the bar associations have joined the growing list of bar associations which have locally gone on record against the nomination.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Philadelphia Bar Association and the resolution of the San Francisco Bar Association against Judge Carswell be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE BAR ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO, FRIDAY, MARCH 20, 1970

Whereas the Bar Association of San Francisco has a policy of recommending and supporting for judicial office those judges and members of the bar who by their character, temperament and experience have demonstrated their special qualifications for judicial office, and opposing the selection for judicial office of those persons who do not possess these qualifications; and

Whereas the members of this Association, as lawyers, are particularly concerned with the status of the Supreme Court of the U.S. as an institution and as a symbol of justice particularly in this day of great scepticism about the ability of the judiciary to deal with current crises; and

Whereas the Directors of this Association recognize the right of the President of the U.S. to appoint to the Supreme Court of the U.S. persons of competence who reflect his judicial and political philosophy, but believe that standards of professional aptitude and experience should be maintained on that court as well as on others; and

Whereas the Directors of this Association have considered the qualifications of G. Harrold Carswell as a lawyer and judge;

Now therefore be it resolved that the Directors of the Bar Association of San Francisco recommend that the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the U.S. be withdrawn or disapproved on the basis of his lack of qualifications to sit on that court.

RESOLUTION UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR ASSOCIATION ON MARCH 23

Whereas, there is no more compelling occasion that calls for the public expression of informed opinion by the organized bar than the occasion of an appointment of a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Whereas, the testimony and statements of leading legal scholars and lawyers raise serious questions as to Judge Carswell's legal ability and judicial stature to serve upon the highest court of our land;

And whereas, the evidence raises serious questions as to Judge Carswell's sensitivity to human and individual rights;

Now therefore be it resolved that the board of governors of the Philadelphia Bar Association hereby urges the Senate of the United States to refuse its consent to the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell to be an associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to add that the Vermont Bar Association also has gone on record against Judge Carswell.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senators from California, Oklahoma, and Indiana for their kind remarks.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HRUSKA. It was with interest that I listened to the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, and I appreciate the very deep interest and the deep thought that he has devoted to it.

I might say, in regard to the news story of Mr. MacKenzie, which has just been inserted in the RECORD, there has already been ample coverage of these facts. It was discussed thoroughly before the Judiciary Committee during the hearings:

On one occasion, the Senator from Nebraska asked the nominee a question, as follows:

Were you an incorporator of that club, as was alleged in one of the accounts I read?

Judge Carswell said:

No, sir.

I do not know whether he misunderstood the question or if he was asked whether he actually drew the articles or what the role was. The fact is that later in the testimony—I believe it was pages 32 and 33—there was a full explanation by the nominee Carswell. I shall go into this in greater detail at a later time. We are on limited time now, I understand.

A full analysis of Mr. MacKenzie's article has been furnished to the editor of the Washington Post in a letter which I, along with Senators GURNEY, ALLOTT, and DOLE, signed. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., March 26, 1970.

The EDITOR,
The Washington Post,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: It is often said that the most desperate charges are made in the closing days of an election. If this has any application to Supreme Court nominees, then the article on your front page yesterday must be an indication that we are approaching a vote on the nomination of Judge Carswell.

We have no quarrel with the one half of the truth which you have told. It is true, as your article states, that Judge Carswell met with representatives of the American Bar Association on the night before his hearing and was shown (but did not examine) a copy of the articles of incorporation for the country club which had been prepared and signed fourteen years earlier. It is true that in the opening minutes of the hearings Judge Carswell responded to a question of Senator Hruska by stating that he was not an incorporator of the country club. It is true that this reply was in error.

The other half of the truth which you have carefully concealed from your readers is that Judge Carswell immediately corrected this misstatement. Less than five minutes later Senator Hruska asked, "Could the stock that you received on this occasion have borne the label, 'incorporator,' indicating that you are one of the contributors to the building fund for the clubhouse?" Judge Carswell responded, "Perhaps. I have no personal recollection." (Judge Carswell had not recently seen the stock certificate.)

Whatever confusion might have been created by his earlier reply was again laid to rest less than an hour later that same morning before the noon recess when the following exchange with Senator Kennedy took place.

"Senator KENNEDY. Did you in fact sign the letter of incorporation?

"Judge CARSWELL. Yes sir. I recall that.

"Senator KENNEDY. What do you recall about that?

"Judge CARSWELL. That they told me when I gave them $100 that I had the privilege of being called an incorporator." (See Hearings, p. 32.)

As if this were not enough, the earlier reply was again corrected that afternoon when Judge Carswell told Senator Bayh, "No. 2, what I have to say about the matter is that whatever the records show and whatever capacity it may be listed that I am in, whether it be director, president, incorporator, or potentate, as I tried to suggest earlier, I had no conversations with anyone about any activities of that organization in any manner at all."

In fact, the corporation whose charter Judge Carswell signed never functioned. It never operated at all. It was replaced by a non-profit corporation which was formed later.

This is brought out at pages 36 and 37 of the hearings:

"The CHAIRMAN. You bought a share of stock in a country club?

"Judge CARSWELL. Yes sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did that corporation ever operate a country club?

"Judge CARSWELL. Never operated at all.

"The CHAIRMAN. Never operated at all?

"Judge CARSWELL. Never operated at all.

"The CHAIRMAN. In fact, it was a corporation organized for profit, wasn't it?

"Judge CARSWELL. That is my understanding, Senator. It was organized for profit and then, later, a nonprofit Corporation was formed, in which I had no part as a director.

"The CHAIRMAN. That was a corporation that operated the country club?

"Judge CARSWELL. That is the one that got the title to the property that has been the subject matter for discussion.

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes."

Our criticism of your most recent attack on Judge Carswell, however, is much more fundamental. Since Judge Carswell first appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee on January 27, everyone has known of the existence of his initial reply and his later clarification that day and the following day. Your reporters were there at the hearing on those days and, since the Post at that time did not suggest that Judge Carswell "misled" the Senate Judiciary Committee, it was doubtless conceded that Judge Carswell had merely made an inadvertent misstatement which he immediately corrected. The notion that Judge Carswell's conflicting statements about a transaction consummated fourteen years ago, based on memory and a glimpse at one of the documents the preceding evening, show an intent to deceive is one which most informed people would not share. Thus the only conceivable basis for the Post's rehashing this two-months-old story on page one simply won't wash.

The same members of the American Bar Association Committee who met with Judge Carswell the night before the hearing later voted to reaffirm their opinion that Judge Carswell was qualified for the Supreme Court. In continuing to support Judge Carswell, they obviously were aware that Judge Carswell had immediately corrected his initial reply and had continued to correct it throughout the rest of his testimony.

Now, however, the Post strenuously attempts to transform this two-months-old testimony into a news story. By referring to the initial reply in the leading sentence on the front page and by burying the one later clarification which you quote at the end of the article on page 12, you manage to leave an entirely inaccurate impression of Judge Carswell's testimony.

It is disappointing that you did not see fit to be more fair and honest.

Sincerely,

EDWARD J. GURNEY,
ROMAN L. HRUSKA,
GORDON ALLOTT,
ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senators.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, as is pointed out, all these things were laid before the American Bar Association committee. They were thoroughly considered in the light of his record, and they reaffirmed unanimously the initial decision of the committee.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not insert that story in the RECORD.

Mr. HRUSKA. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not know about the story. But I did not believe that Judge Tuttle's position had been made clear.

I noticed a letter from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee a few days ago—I think it was Sunday—to the editor of the Post, in which he said that the record, so far as he knew and so far as the committee's records show, had only the letter from Judge Tuttle saying that he supported the nominee. Unless the Senator from Maryland is grossly misinformed, this no longer stands. So I think this is a matter on which the record is not at all clear. That is what I made reference to.

After all, Judge Tuttle is a key figure, having been the Chief Judge of this district, and a man of great reputation and prestige in the area. I think this is a matter of great importance, and it ought to be cleared up.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, we could go on ad infinitum if we are going to say, "Well, that story has been told; let us get another one."

The fact when the nomination was sent up, Judge Tuttle wrote a handwritten letter and that letter is in the record.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. HRUSKA. The committee has heard nothing from him since. It is to be presumed that, inasmuch as he has been in this picture by reason of telephone calls from both sides, and many people are involved in it, and if he does not express any indication of wanting to amend or revise his testimony, he does not intend to do so. Are we to hold this record open indefinitely for all the judges and all the witnesses, to give them a chance to change their minds? I do not think that is reasonable to expect.

The Supreme Court has had eight members on it since last May, and we are engaging in what is not a filibuster, to be sure. It is extended debate. Thank goodness we have a date fixed for the vote on the motion to recommit and for a vote on the nomination.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have the floor. I would like to make this comment.

I hope the Senator did not get the impression that the situation regarding Judge Tuttle is the only reason that has developed—that is, the indecision as to where he stands. It is only one of the more important ones. The Senator has confirmed the fact that the record of the committee stands as it was at the time they reported the nomination. But I must say that I have sufficient respect for the integrity of the Senator from Maryland that he would not say this on the floor, that he had received telegrams and information to the contrary, if it were not so. I think that should be cleared up, but let me make it clear, that it is one of the incidents which I think need clarifying.

The other developments, many of which have come since then, such as the expressions by the Philadelphia Bar and, as I am just told, by the Vermont Bar, and the San Francisco Bar, were not considered by the Judiciary Committee. In a matter of this kind, there is a great distinction between a judge being considered and a prospective Cabinet member.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Thus, I submit there is a great difference.

If I have any more time I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN).

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, referring to the position of the Vermont Bar——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator will allow me to interject, the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) stated to me a moment ago that he had the information that the Vermont Bar had come out against Judge Carswell.

Mr. AIKEN. May I make this explanation: The Vermont Bar, as I have been advised, had its annual meeting last Friday with 240 members present.

Early Friday afternoon, an attempt was made to bring up the Carswell nomination, but the motion to discuss the Carswell nomination failed.

By 4 o'clock, 140 of the 240 members had left, and the matter was then brought up and Mr. Carswell's nomination was disapproved by a vote of 70 to 30, with 140 absentees.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That clarifies it.

Mr. AIKEN. I will say, however—I do not say I approve or disapprove of the action taken on Judge Carswell—but I will say that the conservative element of the Vermont Bar elected all the officers this year, whereas last year, it was just the opposite. Thus, the Senator from Arkansas can draw his own conclusion as to what the situation is in the Vermont bar.

But there were 240 good lawyers, and unfortunately——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That was not stated by this Senator, but by the Senator from California.

Mr. AIKEN. I understand. But there were 140 of them who went home to do the milking, or something else, leaving behind 100 politically astute lawyers who then proceeded to bring the Carswell resolution up a second time. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I want it to be clear that this has become such a controversial matter, with so many communications coming in on the subject from my own State, that I believe it would be much wiser for the committee to take another look at it, and then for us to pass upon it. Without further consideration by the Judiciary Committee, it seems to me it would be unwise to conclude action on this nomination.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, earlier this week I addressed myself to the question of whether Judge Carswell has the ability to put aside his own prejudices and biases so as to be able to approach every case with a fair and open mind. Stated another way, the question is whether regardless of the color of one's skin or one's social or economic class, every man may expect and in fact has received a fair trial in Judge Carswell's court.

Mr. President, if the hallowed principle of equal justice under law is not to become an empty slogan, we cannot condone one single instance of overt judicial favoritism, intolerance, or hostility. Justice in every case must be, in actuality and appearance, even handed.

Thus, if but one lawyer had come forward to report a case in which Judge Carswell manifested from the bench an antagonism toward or bias against the rights of a litigant who was black or poor, this alone would have raised serious doubts as to whether he has the requisite judicial temperament to sit on any Federal court not to mention the highest court of our land.

The case against this nomination does not rest on only one instance of highly improper judicial conduct. No less than seven lawyers who were involved in civil rights cases before Judge Carswell have already spoken of his blatant inability to divorce himself from his personal bias.

Time and again lawyers have stated that Judge Carswell has comported himself in a matter which demeans the Federal judiciary and is totally at odds with the basic principles of fairness upon which our judicial system is founded. The regrettable experiences of Prof. Leroy Clark, Prof. John Lowenthal, Norman Knopf, Ernst Rosenberger, and Theodore Bowers evidence a pattern of conduct on the part of Judge Carswell that is deserving of censure, not reward; deserving of admonishment, not elevation to the Supreme Court.

It is indeed shocking to contemplate the statements of those members of the legal profession who have actually practiced before Judge Carswell in cases involving the rights of the poor, the blacks, and the disadvantaged.

Prof. Leroy Clark:

The most hostile federal district court judge I have ever appeared before with respect to civil rights matters.

Florida attorney, Theodore R. Bowers:

Judge Carswell is the most prejudiced judge before whom I have had the honor to practice.

Prof. John Lowenthal:

I can only describe (Judge Carswell's) attitude (in voter registration case) as being extremely hostile.

Justice Department Attorney Norman Knopf:

Judge Carswell made clear . . . that he did not approve of any of this voter registration going on.

Florida attorney, Maurice Rosen:

The reputation of Judge Carswell among attorneys handling civil rights cases . . . was that they could not expect to win a civil rights related case before him.

Florida lawyer, James Senderlin:

Judge Carswell could not be relied on for a fair, impartial and equitable disposition of civil rights matters.

Mr. President, yesterday I received telegrams from two more members of the Florida bar who, on the basis of their personal experiences in Judge Carswell's court, have decided to speak out against this nomination. The telegrams come from Judge James W. Matthews, associate municipal judge for the city of Opa Locka, and Judge Harold L. Braynon, municipal judge for the city of Miami.

Judge Matthews, who has been a member of the Florida bar for over 11 years and who has served as an assistant U.S. attorney for the southern district of Florida, states in his telegram:

I have practiced in Judge Carswell's court while he served as the United States District Judge. I believe that Judge Carswell has shown bias toward civil rights litigants on many occasions. While trying a particular case in Judge Carswell's court, it was quite evident to me that my client's were not accorded equal treatment. Judge Carswell gave every indication of his distaste for handling civil rights matters. I am of the opinion that Judge Carswell cannot be completely objected (sic) in the handling of civil rights cases, if his nomination to the Supreme Court is confirmed. I feel confident that most black lawyers practicing in the State of Florida would go on record as being opposed to his confirmation. Harrold Carswell is not the type or caliber jurist to serve as an Associate Justice on the Supreme Court of the United States. I strongly implore you to vote against his confirmation.

Judge Braynon, who has been a member of the Florida bar for 8 years and has served as an assistant to the attorney general of the State of Florida for 2 years, states in his telegram:

I have been present in the United States District Court, Northern Division, while Judge Carswell presided on many occasions. It is my firm belief that his attitude toward civil rights cases and the lawyers that handle those cases was indeed outright hostile. His reputation among black lawyers in the State of Florida is not at all good. I would urge you and other well thinking Senators to vote against his nomination to the Supreme Court of this great country.

Mr. President, the statements from these two judges together with the testimony and statements of others who have been treated unjustly in Judge Carswell's court, carry one clear message: Judge Carswell does not have the ability to divorce his personal bias from his judicial conduct, he does not possess the fair and open mind which is an absolute prerequisite for a Justice of the Supreme Court, and his nomination should be defeated.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete telegrams from which I read portions be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIAMI, FLA.,
March 25, 1970.

Senator TYDINGS,
U.S. Senator,
New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

SENATOR TYDINGS: I am a member of the Florida Bar and have been for over 11 years. In addition thereto, I have served as an assistant to the United States attorney for the Southern District of Florida for a period in excess of two years. I have practiced in Judge Carswell's court while he served as the United States District Judge. I believe that Judge Carswell has shown bias toward civil rights litigants on many occasions. While trying a particular case in Judge Carswell's court, it was quite evident to me that my client's were not accorded equal treatment. Judge Carswell gave every indication of his distaste for handling civil rights matters. I am of the opinion that Judge Carswell cannot be completely objective in the handling of civil rights cases, if his nomination to the Supreme Court is confirmed. I feel confident that most black lawyers practicing in the State of Florida would go on record as being opposed to his confirmation. Harrold Carswell is not the type or caliber jurist to serve as an Associate Justice on the Supreme Court of the United States. I strongly implore you to vote against his confirmation.

JAMES W. MATTHEWS,
Associate Municipal Judge for the City of Opa Locka.

MIAMI, FLA.,
March 25, 1970.

Senator TYDINGS,
U.S. Senator,
New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

SENATOR TYDINGS: The possible confirmation of Harrold Carswell as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court makes it necessary for me to make my position known to the United States Senate. I have served as an assistant to the attorney general of the State of Florida for two years and have been a member of the Florida Bar for 8 years. I have been present in the United States District Court, northern division, while Judge Carswell presided on many occasions. It is my firm belief that his attitude towards civil rights cases and the lawyers that handle those cases was indeed outright hostile. His reputation among black lawyers in the State of Florida is not at all good. I would urge you and other well thinking Senators to vote against his nomination to the Supreme Court of this great country.

HAROLD L. BRAYNON,
Municipal Judge for the City of Miami.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, in connection with the nomination of Judge Carswell, I have received a letter from an eminent authority in jurisprudence and law. It comes from Prof. Charles Alan Wright, at the University of Texas at Austin, at the school of law there.

First let me read from the statement of Charles Alan Wright when he testified in the Haynsworth nomination, which is to be found at page 591 of the Haynsworth hearings:

For more than twenty years my professional specialty has been observing closely, and teaching and writing about, the work of federal courts. From 1950 to 1955 I was a member of the faculty at the University of Minnesota Law School and I have been at The University of Texas since that time. I was a visiting professor at the University of Pennsylvania Law School in 1959–60, at the Harvard Law School in 1964–65, and at the Yale Law School in 1968–69. I regularly teach courses in Federal Courts and in Constitutional Law, a seminar in Federal Courts, and a seminar on the Supreme Court. Since 1964 I have been a member of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States and prior to that time was a member of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules. I was Reporter for the recently-completed Study of Division of Jurisdiction between State and Federal Courts made by the American Law Institute.

My writings include a seven-volume revision of the Barron and Holtzoff Treatise on Federal Practice and Procedure. That set of books is now being supplanted by a new treatise on the same subject. Publication of the new treatise began in February of this year with my three volumes on criminal practice and procedure, and the first of the volumes on civil litigation, which I am writing in collaboration with Professor Arthur R. Miller, was published in April. In addition I am the author of a one-volume hornbook, Wright on Federal Courts, a second edition of which is now at the publisher's, and, in collaboration with two others, am the author of the Fourth Edition of Cases on Federal Courts.

Professor Wright is an eminent and highly respected figure in the practice and teaching of law. He is a legal scholar. He sent me a letter on March 18, 1970, which I received 2 or 3 days later.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the letter be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, the letter states in part:

I have known Harrold Carswell for eight years and argued a case before him prior to that time. I have also had the benefit—as I suspect many of the professors who oppose him have not—of reading every word of the hearings with regard to his nomination as well as the Report of the Judiciary Committee and the statements of individual views that accompany it. I studied with particular care the testimony of Dean Pollak and Professor Van Alstyne. They are good friends of mine for whose judgment I have the utmost respect. In this particular instance however their views do not persuade me that there is any sufficient reason for refusing to confirm Judge Carswell.

The critical comments about Judge Carswell's ability have rested almost entirely on a reading of his opinions. I do not think that this is a fair measure of a judge and especially not of a district judge who writes opinions in only a tiny proportion of the matters he hears. As I have read these criticisms of Judge Carswell I have been reminded of Justice Frankfurter's comments about Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite in Frankfurter's book The Commerce Clause (1937). At page 76 Professor Frankfurter, as he then was, said of Waite that "to deny him significance is to allow the pedestrianism of his opinions to obstruct understanding of a great judge. History ought not to reflect contemporary misjudgment, due in no small degree to Waite's lack of the grand manner, his total want of style. The touch of the commonplace about him was, indeed, the key to his appointment as Chief Justice." and Frankfurter said:

Then he goes on to say, later in his letter:

I read with care in the Congressional Record for March 13th the name of those who had signed the statement urging rejection of the nomination. After twenty years of law teaching I know how easy it is to get law professors to sign petitions and statements. My expectation is that most of the law professors who signed the statement did not support Richard M. Nixon for President. I further believe that most of them based their judgment entirely on what they read in the press and that they have not studied Judge Carswell's work or the record of the hearings.

I hope that the nomination will be confirmed.

Respectfully yours,
CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT.

Mr. President, I think he says much in this two-page letter. It is my hope that our colleagues in this body will read the letter thoughtfully and be inspired by it.

EXHIBIT 1

THE UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS AT AUSTIN SCHOOL OF LAW,
Austin, Tex., March 18, 1970.

Hon. ROMAN L. HRUSKA,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HRUSKA: I have followed with interest and concern the controversy that has developed about the nomination of Judge Carswell for the Supreme Court. I was asked to testify before the Judiciary Committee on his behalf. Unfortunately the hearings came at a time when I was sick in bed and in any event I doubted whether my support would be useful after the vigorous role I had taken—and am still taking, see my letter to the editor in the March issue of the American Bar Association Journal—about Judge Haynsworth.

I have recently had called to my attention an article that appeared in The Washington Post a month or more ago. In it the following sentence appeared: "Opponents point out that of three legal educators who testified in favor of Haynsworth, one made a special trip to Washington to testify against Carswell and the other two have made no public comment on the nomination. It is plain that I am one of the "other two" referred to and I should be very unhappy if my silence were thought to mean that I do not support the nomination.

I have known Harrold Carswell for eight years and argued a case before him prior to that time. I have also had the benefit—as I suspect many of the professors who oppose him have not—of reading every word of the hearings with regard to his nomination as well as the Report of the Judiciary Committee and the statements of individual views that accompany it. I studied with particular care the testimony of Dean Pollak and Professor Van Alstyne. They are good friends of mine for whose judgment I have the utmost respect. In this particular instance however their views do not persuade me that there is any sufficient reason for refusing to confirm Judge Carswell.

The critical comments about Judge Carswell's ability have rested almost entirely on a reading of his opinions. I do not think that this is a fair measure of a judge and especially not of a district judge who writes opinions in only a tiny proportion of the matters he hears. As I have read these criticisms of Judge Carswell I have been reminded of Justice Frankfurter's comments about Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite in Frankfurter's book The Commerce Clause (1937). At page 76 Professor Frankfurter, as he then was, said of Waite that "to deny him significance is to allow the pedestrianism of his opinions to obstruct understanding of a great judge. History ought not to reflect contemporary misjudgment, due in no small degree to Waite's lack of the grand manner his total want of style. The touch of the commonplace about him was, indeed, the key to his appointment as Chief Justice." Again at pages 110 and 111 Frankfurter said:

"No doubt Waite had neither the power nor the subtlety of Marshall and Taney. He was not of their flight. Yet he belongs to the great tradition of the Court. For he was true to De Tocqueville's admonition against confounding the familiar with the necessary, and thereby escapes inclusion among those to whom Mr. Justice Holmes referred when he wrote. 'It is a misfortune if a judge reads his conscious or unconscious sympathy with one side or the other prematurely into the law, and forgets that what seem to him to be first principles are believed by half his fellow men to be wrong.' Waite's temperament was staid, and his imagination was never ignited by the spark of genius. But he did not confine the Constitution within the limits of his own experience, nor did he read merely his own mind to discover the powers that may be exercised by a great nation. The disciplined and disinterested lawyer in him transcended the bounds of the environment within which he moved and the views of the clients whom he served at the bar. He brought to the Court no emotional commitments compelling him to translate his own economic or political convictions into constitutional commands."

(This marks the end of the proceedings which were ordered to be printed at this point by unanimous consent.)

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I join in the motion just made by the distinguished Senator from Indiana. I think it is a worthy motion, as I stated earlier this week in the Senate and earlier today in connection with the statement of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

I hope that even those who have been proponents of this nomination will now, as I said when I first suggested this course last week, join in this motion because I think there are matters which deserve consideration again in connection with this nomination by the Committee on the Judiciary.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Indiana for the very excellent leadership which he has shown in regard to this entire matter and for making the motion which he has just placed before the Senate.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I appreciate the kind remarks of my colleague and good friend from Oklahoma.

I would like to point out that, indeed, it was the Senator from Oklahoma who had expressed earlier concern about this nomination and who suggested this vehicle as one which might come closer to solving the problem of this nomination than other parliamentary vehicles available to us.

I appreciate the Senator's comments on my leadership. I am frank to say that this is leadership which is not at the top of the priority list as far as the various opportunities we have in the Senate. If one believes in the advice and consent responsibility of the Senate, as the Senator from Indiana does and, as I think most Members of this body do, I do not believe we should rubberstamp nominations from the President. That is why I have felt it necessary on two occasions to help in some small way to suggest to the President that we could get a better man.

I would like to make one further observation. It seems to me that this motion to recommit, although it can be interpreted in a number of ways, indeed, does give us an opportunity to express deep reservation and concern to the President about this nomination to the Supreme Court. This motion to recommit gives us an opportunity to say to the President, "Mr. President, take another look. Voluntarily remove us and yourself from this very controversial and questionable position. Find us another man on whom we can readily agree and who most of us will feel is qualified to serve on the highest court of our land."

I think this can be realistically interpreted as a good-faith effort to get the President, on his own initiative, to solve this problem before the Senate has to speak generally on it.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, as the junior Senator from Alabama understands, even though the motion to recommit has been made, in no event will there be a vote on that motion prior April 6, after the argument for that day has been concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). As provided in the unanimous-consent agreement, that is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Also, since a motion to table is not debatable, and since debate is guaranteed under the unanimous-consent agreement, no motion to table would be in order until the debate has been concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Presiding Officer.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Judge Harrold Carswell be laid aside now and the Senate proceed in further consideration of the conference report on H.R. 514, as in legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS OF ASSISTANCE FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate, as in legislative session, resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 514) to extend programs of assistance for elementary and secondary education, and for other purposes.

AUTHORIZATION TO SIGN DULY ENROLLED BILLS DURING ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Vice President, the President pro tempore, or the Acting President pro tempore be authorized to sign duly enrolled bills during the adjournment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR YOUNG OF OHIO ON TUESDAY, MARCH 31, 1970

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, immediately following the disposition of the reading of the Journal, the able Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG) be recognized for not to exceed 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Has the requisite time under paragraph 3 of rule VIII, the so-called germaneness rule, now expired for today?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I thank the Chair.

SALUTE TO PAUL H. DOUGLAS ON HIS 78TH BIRTHDAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today is the 78th birthday of Paul H. Douglas, our friend and former colleague who brought to the Senate of the United States a massive intellect, courageous action, and incisive judgment. He was the noblest Athenian of them all.

Allen Nevins said of him:

Of all our Senators, none has written a more consistently elevated record of public service; none has so clearly combined intellectual distinction—technical expertness—with practical legislative power; none has set so high a moral tone.

Paul Douglas was the LaFollette and Norris of our time. Those men were his two senatorial heroes, and the inspiration Paul drew from them served the Nation well. Along with portraits of Abraham Lincoln, Jane Addams, John Peter Altgeld, and Clarence Darrow, they graced the walls of his senatorial office.

While most men are fortunate to distinguish themselves in a single career, Paul Douglas has distinguished himself in many.

He first of all was a teacher and economist. Along with Charles W. Cobb he produced a unique and seminal contribution to economics in the work "The Theory of Production"—the Cobb-Douglas Production Function—which first appeared in the American Economic Review in March 1928. His book, "The Theory of Wages" won for him an international prize and is one of the classic works in the literature. It graces the Oxford syllabus on economics along with the works of Keynes, Marshall, Pigou and Hicks, and Joan Robinson. His teaching career at the University of Illinois, Reed College, and the University of Chicago was capped when he was elected president of the American Economic Association at the end of World War II.

In the 1920's and 1930's he distinguished himself as a great private citizen. Almost singlehandedly he brought down the Insull traction empire which had corrupted both the business and the political life of Chicago and of Illinois. The result was the Illinois Utilities Act which he drafted.

He served with distinction as an arbitrator in the printing industry. He served on the Illinois Housing Commission. He was an expert consultant on unemployment to Franklin Roosevelt. He helped draft the original social security law. He was one of the first men who recognized and spoke out against the threat which Hitler and fascism posed to the security of the United States and to the freedom of the world.

In his private role in these years, Paul Douglas fought for consumer issues before there was a consumer movement. He was a conservationist before the word "environment" became popular and the word "ecology" was even known.

He proposed family allowances and minimum family incomes decades before those questions were placed on the agenda of public needs.

During World War II, he elected another career and gained yet further distinction. He prevailed upon his friend, Col. Frank Knox, then Secretary of the Navy, to waive his poor eyesight and, at age 50, Paul Douglas joined the Marine Corps as a private. He went through boot training at Parris Island and was chosen the top boot in his class. He chose to become a combat Marine, rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel, was twice wounded in combat at Pelilieu and Okinawa, and was awarded the Bronze Star for gallantry in action. At Okinawa, he deliberately forsook the safety of a behind-the-lines command post, volunteered as a stretcher bearer at the Naha-Shuri line where the battle was raging, was wounded and almost lost his left arm, and nearly bled to death when he ordered the other men evacuated first. According to the eyewitness testimony of the chaplain who was there, he told the Navy doctors and corpsmen at the front line medical station he was "Private" Douglas to prevent them giving him special treatment because of his rank. Such is the stuff of which Paul Douglas is made.

He entered on a fourth career—a political career—first as alderman from the Fifth Ward in Chicago, where he earned a deserved reputation as a fearless, independent minded, maverick in the Chicago City Council, and in 1948 as U.S. Senator from Illinois.

In the Senate he distinguished himself again. He introduced and nursed through the legislative process a vast quantity of legislation—the major features of the landmark 1949 Housing Act, railroad retirement legislation, the 1955 Minimum Wage Act, the Union-Management Pension and Welfare Fund Act, the depressed areas bills, a series of civil rights provisions over the sternest opposition any Senator can encounter, the bill to save the Indiana dunes, and dozens of others.

But men are known for the bad bills they stop and for the causes they espouse as well as the legislation they put on the law books.

The 1960 study of prices, wages, and growth by the Joint Economic Committee was the blueprint for the economic policies of the first 6 years of the 1960's—policies which combined a vast increase in economic growth, a major reduction in the level of unemployment, and the most stable price levels of any industrial country in the world.

He was the first Senator to mount a major campaign against the loopholes in our tax laws.

He, along with a handful of others, of which I am proud to include myself as one, stopped the attack on the equal representation opinion of the Supreme Court and preserved the concept of one man, one vote.

He was the architect of the Federal Reserve-Treasury accord.

He applied benefit-cost analysis to public works projects before benefit-cost analysis became popular.

The number of times he stopped new tax loopholes, prevented an economic subsidy to a special interest group because their advocates knew that he would be watching for it on the floor, or stripped a measure of its facade and exposed its real fabric to public debate, are legion.

As Allen Nevins—a truly great historian—said:

> He has sometimes been on the unpopular side; he has sometimes been on the losing side; but he has always been on the just side.

A number of instances which exemplify Paul Douglas' Senate career spring easily to mind. In 1953, Paul Douglas and Lister Hill were leading the fight against the massive giveaway of offshore oil to the States who were much easier prey to the oil companies than the Federal Government. They contended that the area beyond the 3-mile limit belonged to the Federal Government and the people of the United States. By holding firm on this issue they forced the proponents of the bill to accept an amendment reserving title to the oil beyond the 3-mile limit to the Federal Government.

It now turns out that the vast abundance of oil is found there. At last count some $4 billion had accrued to the Treasury of the United States from leases and royalties, most of which would otherwise have ended up in the treasuries of the major oil companies.

Paul Douglas proved by that act alone that a liberal need not be a wastrel.

In 1960, he and the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) introduced a bill to provide Federal registrars to register disenfranchised Negroes in those States where they have actually been prevented from voting. That bill was killed by the leadership of the Senate. The ineffective system of court appointed referees continued.

But 5 years to the day after that bill had been killed by the majority and minority leadership of the Senate, an almost identical measure was sent to the Senate by the President of the United States, and was embraced by the minority leader, the same two men who had killed it 5 years before. It became law.

That exemplified the intellectual power and eventual success of causes which Paul Douglas championed. And much the same is true of his championship of consumer causes—especially truth in lending—and his fights on military waste.

Finally, his one-man fight to save the Indiana Dunes for the people of the United States against every conceivable powerful economic group one could imagine, was a modern saga of David and Goliath.

He often said:

> As a young man I wanted to save the world. In my forties, I wanted to save the United States. But in my sixties, I felt the most important thing I could do was to save the Dunes.

Paul Douglas did all of these things and more. But with it he combines a warm heart and a forgiving countenance. While no man has ever demanded a higher level of ethical conduct from himself, no man understands so well and is more forgiving of the weaknesses and shortcomings of others. While he never boasted of it, dozens of men in personal or financial difficulty constantly turned to him and were in turn helped by him. At any one time there was a cadre of human beings whose lives had been seared by the harshness of events whom he was helping with funds, encouragement, and human compassion.

He combines with a massive intellect, a warm heart, and compassionate spirit which is unique among men.

Since leaving the Senate he has continued his careers. He taught at the New School for Social Research. He has headed a consumers group to support the closing of tax loopholes, and he has published one book and has finished another.

For 2 years he headed the National Commission on Urban Problems. In the hot summer of 1967 the Commission held hearings in the ghettos of 2 dozen American cities while the civil disorders of that year followed and preceded it. The Commission published more than 20 detailed studies on every aspect of the housing problem and concluded with a massive report, "Building the American City," which is a gold mine of background, information, and recommendations on the ills of American housing and urban development.

Throughout all these careers, Paul has had with him his lovely and charming wife, Emily Taft Douglas. Distinguished in her own right as an author, and as an actress and artist, she was a Member of Congress as Congresswoman at Large from Illinois before Paul Douglas was elected to the Senate. Paul often said that he was first elected on a case of mistaken identity when the citizens of Illinois thought they were voting for his wife rather than for him. And he has claimed that while many wives have succeeded their husbands in public office, this is the first time a husband has succeeded his wife.

Paul Douglas, we salute you on this your 78th birthday. May your careers continue to flourish.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I am delighted that I happened to be in the Chamber when the able Senator from Wisconsin expressed his birthday good wish to Paul Douglas. I could not have expressed it as elcquently, but I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will let me add a footnote to that birthday card. It bespeaks my sentiments, also.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I might say that of all the Senators now serving in the Senate, there is no one Paul would rather have congratulate him than the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am delighted that I happened to walk into the Chamber when the senior Senator from Wisconsin was making his remarks about former Senator Paul Douglas.

I endorse everything the Senator from Wisconsin has said about Senator Douglas. I have known him since 1949. I think it can be correctly stated that he is one of the handful of distinguished and great statesmen of the 20th century, and his valuable contribution to the dialog about the issues that confronted the country and the world over the years that he spent in the Senate is unmatched by anybody else I know.

I might add that on top of it all, he was a man of great integrity and a man of great courage.

I am pleased to join the Senator from Wisconsin in the fine tribute he has made here today.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank my colleague from Wisconsin.

I want to recall once again the fact that Senator Paul Douglas was a conservationist—as I said, an ecologist, before that word was known. The Senator from Wisconsin has become the real champion in this country, in my view, of conservation, especially with the measures he has introduced this year; but for a long time this has been true.

I know that Senator Paul Douglas will be extremely grateful to my colleague for his fine tribute.

Mr. NELSON. He was a great and thoughtful conservationist. His last great fight on the floor of the Senate—and great success, of course—was the passage of the Indiana Dunes bill, for which he fought for many years against some of the most powerful forces in this country, and he finally achieved a victory of great consequence to the whole country.

MAN AND HIS ENVIRONMENT

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, we are only now beginning to understand the subtle but unbreakable bond between man and his environment. As we confront the specific scars of physical degradation about us and learn of the multitude of individual environmental insults which occur each day, we must carefully consider the role that man and his activities have played in producing this deterioration.

For almost 100 years, we in the United States have been pursuing a policy of industrialization and urbanization. We have measured our success quantitatively and the mystical indicators in this quest have been the gross national product and the Dow–Jones industrial average. Unfortunately, in our myopic pursuit of ever-increasing levels of production and consumption we failed to detect and concern ourselves with the corresponding decrease in quality of life. And so today, we find ourselves in the position of having to cope with the accumulated costs of years of unrestricted environmental despoiliation.

In the headlong search for plenty, we are learning that we are ending up with less. We are discovering that man cannot live or act apart from his environment. The seemingly unrelated actions of another day and another place are erupting in a continuum of environmental abscesses: we sprayed the field to kill the pests and introduced a long-lived poison into our soil, water, and bodies; we mined the coal to produce the power and feed the machines, and raped the landscape and gave our streams acid indigestion; we rushed to put up the suburbs and slashed away the ground cover and silted our waterways; we elevated the automobile to almost religious significance, and multiplied the number of efficient pumps for pouring toxic substances into the air; and we channel industrial technology into creating new consumer products and processes, and multiplied the number of chemical contaminants that can foul our air, water, land, and even food.

The list of such shortsighted, terricidal actions is vast, and they all bore the label—"Progress." The boastful nature with which these actions were initially proclaimed reminds me of the traveler in Shelley's poem "Ozymandias," who came across a broken statue of the ancient king in the desert wastes. On the pedestal the traveler found these words: "My name is Ozymandias, king of kings: Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!" And the traveler saw that "Round the decay/Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare/The lone and level sands stretch far away."

Will it be that the enduring monument to our acts of past bravado shall be the endless wasteland, the wastes of the productive-consumptive society stretching far away—without a man to record the scene in verse?

It is to be hoped that the new awareness of the ecological bonds between man and his environment, and increased knowledge of the burdens imposed by past actions, will lead this country to a new operating ethic, and will establish quality of life as a primary goal for all our people. There are some encouraging signs that this may occur. In particular, I have found an understanding, an awareness, and a desire among our younger citizens for environmental improvement. It is to be hoped that with their energy, dedication, and above all, greater ecologic knowledge, they may be able to persuade their elders to alter old attitudes.

But the movement to change ingrained patterns and habits will not be easy. In Sunday's New York Times, Mr. Tom Wicker gives thoughtful consideration to the momentum which propels narrow-viewed industrial and environmental actions.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Wicker's March 22, 1970, article entitled "In the Nation: All Is Not Gold, Etc." printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NATION: ALL IS NOT GOLD, ETC.

(By Tom Wicker)

One airline now has asked for, and another is considering, a surcharge to be imposed on transcontinental passengers flying the big new 747 jet planes. This makes again the necessary, if bitter, point that even in the age of technology things are not always what they seem, and even less what they are predicted to be.

The 747, to which the public is now being seduced by the usual overblown advertising, was developed to carry larger payloads more economically and thus—so everyone was assured—to reduce long-haul fares. The craft's performance apparently justifies the expectation, but the public may have to pay the surcharge anyway.

UNEXPECTED COSTS

The trouble is that no one realized that the huge new plane would run up the cost of ground operations by as much as 30 per cent; or, if anyone did realize it, no one scrupled to warn the public or temper the advertising wind to the shorn lamb. So it may be a long time, if ever, before the passenger gets all the promised benefits of the 747.

It will be well to bear this in mind as pressures continue for the even newer supersonic jets. And the ironic lesson of the 747 surcharge—that technological and industrial achievements can bring unexpected and unwanted side effects—is being frequently taught in far more dangerous ways. But it is much less frequently heeded.

Both President Nixon and the relevant committees of Congress, for instance, are pledging to build sewage-treatment plants everywhere they are needed. The major issue seems to be how much money will be required for this quick response to the current environmental interest, and what share of it the Federal Government ought to pay. Few question what the money will be spent for.

In fact, if a great many more large sewage-treatment plants of the usual kind are to be built, with the treated matter carried off to the nearest waterway, an incerase in eutrophication of our lakes and streams will follow. This is the process in which the treated matter simulates the growth of algae, which chokes the water and crowds out other species.

SEWAGE EXPERIMENT

The March issue of Environment Magazine makes this point in a report on an interesting experiment at Pennsylvania State University, where a "living filter" for sewage has been successfully developed. In this experiment, the treated matter was piped away and sprinkled on the earth. The result was an increase in agricultural productivity, a consequent decline in the need for chemical fertilizers (another water pollutant), a rise in the water table from a source that otherwise would have been carried by stream flows to the sea, and an ultimate ability to use the waste as drinking water.

The report warns that this plan is more adaptable to small-city and suburban needs than to metropolitan areas, but it makes the necessary points that in complex environmental questions a variety of aspects—not just economics or convenience—has to be considered, and that now, not when it is too late, is the time to re-evaluate present concepts of sewage disposal.

LESS POWER NEEDED

The same issue of the same magazine raises even more challenging questions: Do we really need all the electric power we're producing and planning to produce? Is what we're planning to do with the power worth the consequences?

Electric-power production is doubling every ten years. At that rate, by the year 2000, power plants of all kinds will raise by twenty degrees the temperature of the total volume of water running over the surface of the United States each year. The amount of carbon dioxide (from fossil plants) and radiation (from nuclear plants) in the air may have drastic effects on the global climate and on all living species.

Since orders for new plants placed in the seventies will account for about half the expectable generating capacity in the year 2000, now is again the time to determine whether all those plants really have to be built. Population increase and over-all economic expansion do not require it. By far the major user is the primary metals industry, and aluminum production alone accounts for 10 per cent of industrial-power consumption.

BEER-CAN POLLUTION

This suggests at once that the aluminum beer can, a litter problem itself, is also a major air and water polluter through power-plant waste. By designing automobiles—an even bigger disposal problem—to be easily reclaimed by manufacturers, energy requirements for their production could be reduced dramatically because making reclaimed steel requires only about a quarter of the energy it takes to make it from ore.

There are many other ways to hold down the need for electric-power production—recycling paper back to its producers, for instance. Heedless acquiescence in more and more plants turning out more and more energy only means more and more poisoning of the environment—a surcharge that, ultimately, no one can afford.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(At 1 o'clock and 59 minutes p.m., the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.)

At 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p.m., the Senate reassembled, when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia).

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) is recognized.

JAMES J. KILPATRICK'S ARTICLE ON 18-YEAR-OLD VOTE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, James J. Kilpatrick is a venerable journalist who has observed the Washington scene for some time. His views are respected by people of all political persuasions and his column is widely read. On Tuesday, March 17, one of his articles entitled "The Senate and the Vote for 18-Year-Olds" appeared in the Evening Star newspaper.

Mr. Kilpatrick makes note of the fact that the Senate traditionally has been the house of Congress that served as a brake on the rash and reckless excesses of the House of Representatives. However, he points out that with the coming of the legislation providing for the 18-year-old vote by act of Congress, the Senate looks more like a Cub Scout den.

He chides the Senate for careening down the legislative highway and drag racing with the law of the land.

Mr. President, Mr. Kilpatrick's discussion of the applicable constitutional law is accurate and to the point, with the point being that Congress cannot by its own action set the voting age for any State.

Mr. President, this article should be read by each Member of this body. Mr. Kilpatrick has held a mirror before the Senate and has in this article reflected its image, which to his eye seems to appear slightly psychedelic.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article "The Senate and the Vote for 18-Year-Olds" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATE AND THE VOTE FOR 18-YEAR-OLDS

(By James J. Kilpatrick)

There was a time, thought it is getting harder and harder to recall it, when the United States Senate served as a sober brake upon the reckless driving of the House. The Senate was the upper chamber; its members were older; and because of their six-year terms, they were not so vulnerable to the voters' passing fancies. The House might be ruled by impetuous youths; the Senate would restain them.

No more. In its top-down dash to achieve 18-year-old voting by simple statute, rather than by constitutional amendment, the Senate is careening down the legislative highway with 500 horses, dual carbs, racing stripes, and an air scoop on the hood. This is the Senate? The chamber looks more like a Cub Scout den, voting on when to eat the weenies.

This impetuous misadventure becomes all the more bizarre when one looks at some of the drivers. Barry Goldwater! That old states righter! And Dominick of Colorado! He is one of the soundest conservatives in the body. Boggs of Delaware! More than 60 members—maybe 70—are prepared to ram this doubtful piece of legislation into law. What has come over the Senate?

From time immemorial, the fixing of a minimum age for voting has been regarded as a matter plainly within the reserved powers of the states. The notion that the Fourteenth Amendment vests such authority in the Congress would stagger the sensibilities of those who framed and ratified that amendment a hundred-odd years ago.

Indeed, the forgotten second section of the 14th Amendment implicitly recognizes 21 as the accepted minimum age for voting. This section provides for a reduction in a state's representation in Congress if the state denies the vote "to any of the male inhabitants of such state, being 21 years of age." Everything in our constitutional history confirms the rule that age is one of those "qualifications requisite for electors" that each state may decide on its own.

It is not necessary to look back to Reconstruction days. Over the past 30 years, more than a score of states have exercised what they understand to be their exclusive power in this field. Georgia went to 18-year-old voting in 1943, Kentucky in 1955. Alaskans now vote at 19, Hawaiians at 20.

Through the old-fashioned devices of referenda, the people steadily are making their wishes known. Oklahoma rejected the 18-year-old idea as far back as 1952. South Dakota said no in 1958. Idaho rejected a 19-year-old minimum in 1960. Within the past two years, voters in Hawaii, Michigan, New Jersey and Tennessee have refused to accept the 18-year-old proposition, and voters in Maryland, Nebraska, North Dakota and Ohio have said no to 19.

Does all this make no impression on the Senate? Eleven other states have scheduled referenda this year on a lower age for voting. The most elementary principles of comity and federalism suggest that Congress wait upon these expressions from the states. No hearings have been held in committee. What's the mad rush? Where's the fire?

On the merits of 18-year-old voting, to be sure, Goldwater and his bedfellows make a persuasive case. It does seem absurd, when you think about it, to cling to an age limit derived, if I am correctly informed, from 18th Century laws of inheritance.

Eighty percent of today's 18-year-olds are high-school graduates. They work, pay taxes, drive automobiles. Nearly a million young men, 18 to 21, are serving in the armed forces. And 18-year-olds are tried in our courts as adults.

The proposition is plausible that 18-year-olds should have a right to vote. I have nothing against it beyond my politically misanthropic instincts which tell me, here and elsewhere, the less democracy the better.

But there are right ways and wrong ways of seeking change. If two-thirds of the senators are so confident of their judgment, why don't they whip up a constitutional amendment, abide by the speed limits, and stop this drag-racing around with the law of our land?

THE STRANGE NOMINATION OF MR. SONNENFELDT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on March 11 the list of nominations received by the Senate included the name of one Helmut Sonnenfeldt of Maryland for appointment as a Foreign Service officer of class I.

This is a most unusual appointment. The Foreign Service is supposed to be composed of career diplomats who have served their country around the world and have their special status recognized through the Foreign Service rating system. The rating of FSO I is normally the highest rank which a career diplomat can achieve aside from the exceptional positions of Career Minister and Career Ambassador, reserved for a handful of the most distinguished members of the corps. Thus, it appears that we have Mr. Sonnenfeldt entering the Foreign Service at the highest rank normally achieved by others after years of service abroad. Thus, this unusual appointment threatens the status and achievement of the many dedicated Foreign Service officers who have served with distinction. It is an affront to the career system and a threat to the stability of impartial ratings and of the morale of those who have worked their way up through the ranks to achieve their present positions.

Mr. Sonnenfeldt's appointment is especially outrageous in view of the fact that at the present time, due to the economy measures being taken throughout the Government, the Foreign Service Corps is currently affected by a reduction in force of approximately 10 percent. This means that about one out of 10 of every career Foreign Service officer reviewed for promotion is "selected out"—that is, severed from the Service. So at the very time when many Foreign Service officers are being severed from the Service because of the high rate compelled by the reduction in force, Mr. Sonnenfeldt, who has never served abroad, is entering into the Foreign Service Corps at the highest possible level.

Mr. President, as I have pointed out, this is a highly unusual situation. In fact, it is a unique situation. I am informed that in the fiscal year of 1970—that is, since June of last year—only three men have made lateral entry into the Foreign Service; two of them at the relatively low class III level and only one at the class I level. That sole individual is Mr. Sonnenfeldt.

We can see, therefore, that Mr. Sonnenfeldt is an exceptional case who is given special treatment at a time when many others are losing their jobs.

I have mentioned that Mr. Sonnenfeldt has never been abroad. I have received information concerning Mr. Sonnenfeldt's personnel history. Originally, he was in civil service status—and in 1965 he was converted from a GS–15 to Foreign Service Reserve Officer II—maximum U.S. duty.

The FSRO was originally conceived by Congress as a means for the temporary use abroad of persons who were particularly qualified in one aspect or another and whose qualifications filled a need for a particular job overseas.

At this period, Mr. William Crockett, who was then Deputy Under Secretary for Administration in the State Department, began to use this wise provision of the law as a means for enlarging his domestic staff without specific congressional authorization. He invented the category of FSRO—maximum U.S. duty—meaning a Foreign Service officer would never be assigned to foreign service. Those who accepted such a service would enjoy a higher pay scale than in civil service, without having the burden of serving abroad. On Mr. Crockett's part, it relieved him of observing civil service regulations with regard to job rights and categories.

Mr. Sonnenfeldt thus entered the Reserve Officer Corps under this highly unusual situation as a FSRO class II—maximum U.S. duty. I am told that in 1967 he was promoted to the rank of FSRO I—maximum U.S. duty—by a special panel dealing only with officers of this unusual category. The same panel recommended that he be converted from FSRO I to FSO I; that is, to permanent status. But the board of examiners reportedly refused to do so because he had not personally applied for the job, and there was no certificate from the Director of the Foreign Service that he was needed. It is significant that, if he had personally applied, then he would have been liable for duty overseas.

Under these circumstances, he was appointed to the National Security Council staff in 1969 in what is essentially a political policymaking position. From the prestige status of this political appointment, he applied for conversion to FSO I in September 1969. He is, in effect, starting at the top. It is hard to escape the assumption that questions of political influence have overshadowed the merit system of the FSO.

It is particularly interesting that Mr. Sonnenfeldt received this special treatment, despite the fact that his wife is known as an antagonist to the present administration. I find it very disturbing that a top assistant in the National Security Council staff, responsible for formulating and advising on our international policy, should be chosen from a milieu which is antagonistic to the work of the President. I do not question the right of Mrs. Sonnenfeldt to engage in political activity, but the question arises whether she acted with the approval or at the direction of her husband. Under the Hatch Act, no Government employee may do indirectly what he is forbidden to do directly. In any event, I find it particularly strange that a top policy adviser is picked from such a political context and, on top of that, given preferential and unusual treatment which threatens the justice and fair workings of the Foreign Service Corps.

In this regard, an article appeared in the Sunday Star last week which discusses Mrs. Sonnenfeldt's political activities. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article "Offbeat Washington" by Vera Glaser and Malvina Stephenson be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Sunday Star, Mar. 22, 1970]

OFFBEAT WASHINGTON: TWO WIVES

Two Democratic wives of high administration officials worked hard to defeat Richard Nixon in 1968.

Now they're "lying low" as off-year election races warm up in another test of his popularity.

The attractive young matrons are Mrs. Helmut Sonnenfeldt, whose husband is a top member of Dr. Henry Kissinger's National Security Council staff in the White House, and Mrs. Robert J. McCloskey, wife of the deputy assistant secretary of state for press relations.

"There is a whole crew of democrats still in key positions in the Nixon administration. It makes me very pleased," said Mrs. Rowena Hoover, executive secretary of the Democratic headquarters in nearby Montgomery County, where the two women have been stalwarts.

"They helped carry the county for the Humphrey-Muskie ticket by 7,400 votes," she recalled.

Marge Sonnenfeldt said she manned get-out-the-vote telephones for presidential candidate Hubert Humphrey on election eve 1968 "until they pulled the wires out."

Anne McCloskey said most of her work had been for Democratic Senatorial Candidate Margaret Schweinhaut, who lost that year to the GOP's Charles M. Mathias Jr.

Both women have been less active since Richard Nixon took office, Mrs. Hoover said.

NOT NAGGING

"I haven't been nagging at Marge because I'm glad to have her husband in the White House. For the most part her terrific energy was used in her neighborhood in 1969," Mrs. Hoover said.

Mrs. McCloskey said candidly that she had toned down her partisan activity because her husband's job made it sensitive.

"I am willing to collect dollars for Democrats but have done no precinct work," she said. Mrs. McCloskey at one time worked for GOP Sen. Jacob Javits of New York.

Mrs. Sonnenfeldt said she felt her partisan activities should not be embarrassing to her husband in the White House because "he's a professional."

CONCURRENCY IN MILITARY WEAPONS PROGRAM

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, earlier this year a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER), told the Senate that 1969 was the year of cost growth in weapons systems but that he hoped 1970 would be the year of cost controls.

This is a point in which we are all interested because our military forces will be stronger if we properly exercise cost control in that better use of our funds will enable us to have more of the weapon systems we need to provide for our national security.

Mr. President, this matter of cost growth has received a great deal of attention by the Congress in the past year. It should be made clear, however, that many billions of dollars represented as cost growth have not been spent to date.

A case in point is the MARK–48 torpedo where the projected cost growth is in the neighborhood of $3 billion dollars, but as of today the Navy has not procured the first production torpedo. This does not mean this program will not experience a huge cost growth. It does mean that the prototypes of this highly sophisticated torpedo have cost thousands of dollars more than the planners in 1962 thought they would cost and when you look at the projected cost of the program into the 1980's the price is going to far exceed that earlier estimate. Many times these costs growths are reduced when the actual buying begins. This results from competition or reduced requirements.

Using those comments to set the cost growth picture somewhat in perspective, I wish to comment for just a few minutes today on a point through which I believe we could greatly improve our weapon systems cost control. This point involves concurrency.

Concurrency is defined in this context as the production of a major weapon system prior to the completion of development and testing. Such a procedure is considered one of the major reasons for the cost growths we have experienced over the past few years.

This concurrent development and production has taken place and is still taking place in a number of major weapon systems of all three of our military services. The services and the Defense Department are aware of the problem and are beginning to take effective steps to control it, but unfortunately they have not gone fast enough or far enough.

The General Accounting Office has found that production of a large number of major Navy weapon systems was undertaken on a large scale for operational use before development and testing was completed. This particular study covered about $2 billion in development funds alone for a 3-year period.

Mr. President, the rapid movement into weapon system programs is often the result of the pressures of a conflict such as Vietnam. The feeling in the services is that we need these systems as soon as possible so the programs are rushed along. There is certainly some justification in this approach and as we all know our concern regarding the need for a stronger intercontinental ballistic missile force a number of years ago resulted in a crash program involving concurrency in the fullest sense of the word.

Today, hopefully, we are moving out of the pressures of such times. We are winding down in the war in Vietnam. New rules should be applied, or old rules should be carefully followed, to insure weapons systems are fully debugged before production is begun. Our weapons system history is replete with the examples of such folly. In past days we have seen the F–111 and other systems as prime examples.

Mr. President, another unfortunate result of concurrency is that our operating forces receive weapons for operational use which do not perform up to requirements. Thus, it is easy to see the failure of rushing a system through, for in rushing it we often get nothing but more costs added on because of necessary retrofits.

Moreover, the record shows that the deployment of ineffective weapons had other results which impaired the overall strength of our military forces. For instance, if you put a weapon system on a Navy ship which does not work then the ship must be taken out of service for retrofits and thus the effective force available is reduced. Some examples covering all three of the services would be the Navy's P–3C, the Army's Sheridan and M60A1E2 tank, and the Air Force's F–111 and C–5A.

It is obvious from the record that tighter controls relating to concurrent development are badly needed. Or perhaps we need better enforcement of the concurrency controls already in effect in the Department of Defense and the individual services.

Last week in an executive session of the Senate Armed Services Committee I asked a series of questions on the concurrency theme. I have been asking questions like this throughout the procurement hearings, and I will continue to ask them of the services.

In my opinion, our Nation's defense must be the strongest in the world, and I mean the strongest in the world without any question. Unfortunately our Military Establishment is being weakened in some areas which could result in threats to our national security. We should all oppose such steps, for if we fall behind the Soviets militarily then all our domestic achievements could be laid to waste.

One way to insure our military strength is to deal decisively with the problems of concurrency. Unfortunately, the services are asking Congress this year for production funds for a number of weapon systems in which sizable research and development work remains to be done. As one of the most glaring examples, money is being asked for production of an airplane while at the same time over 50 percent of the research and development work remains to be funded.

Possibly the purchase of these planes should be in the research and development account, but it was not presented to Congress that way.

Mr. President, the risks for concurrent development are great from the standpoint of the effectiveness of the system as well as the cost to the taxpayer. Past experience has shown us something must be done in this area, if not by the Defense Establishment, then by Congress.

THE CHEYENNE HELICOPTER

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, an interesting and informative article on Army Aviation as published in the March issue of Government Executive magazine.

This article is especially informative because the Congress is considering additional research and development funds for the Army's proposed gunship, the Cheyenne helicopter.

The war in South Vietnam has resulted in the application of the Army's air mobility concepts which followed World War II. The result has been that the Army has successfully employed helicopters in combat to provide air mobility for a percentage of our ground forces. The tremendous utilization of this concept has resulted in the development of the helicopter gunship which provides certain types of close air support to our ground forces.

This airborne fire support has initially been provided through the conversion of troop transport helicopters to helicopter gunships. The result has been the Huey Cobra helicopters which provide a type of firepower not available from fixed wing close air support planes.

As a result of the knowledge gained in Vietnam the Army began development of the Cheyenne which has a fuselage like a jet fighter and travels at speeds of 200 miles per hour, but is propelled by rigid rotary blades rather than the thrust of jet engines.

While the development of the Cheyenne has had its problems which resulted in the cancellation last year of the production contract, it is still an important program which should be continued from a research standpoint. We have already spent around $170 million on this development program and have about $30 million to go.

Mr. President, this article addresses some of the popular opinions which have resulted from the helicopter type war we have conducted in Vietnam. To a degree the author dispels the popular idea that the helicopter is an extremely vulnerable weapon system. The article also makes the point that the helicopter gunship can give close ground support in a way which is impossible for Air Force close support planes to match.

Hopefully, the Nixon doctrine will bring us into an era of relative peace in this decade, but no matter what policies the United States follows we are faced with continued Communist probes is Asia, the Middle East, Africa, or South America. In the event our national security is endangered by any such moves the helicopter gunship would be an invaluable weapons system for the limited type deployment of military forces that military confrontations of the future seem to require.

This article includes some provocative comments on the concepts which our ground commanders might have to employ in such areas, and should be of interest to the Congress as we deal with the important task of our defense appropriations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMY AVIATION: AFTER VIETNAM, WHAT?

HIGHLIGHTS

1. Army aviation, no longer a short-lived, Vietnam phenomenon, is emerging as a major facet of Army tactical planning.

2. Plans and programs under way at Army Aviation Systems Command in St. Louis suggest a confrontation with the Air Force over aerial missions may be in the offing.

3. The myth of helicopter vulnerability, now shattered, provides the basis for a well-reasoned Army argument for going into aviation in a big way.

4. AVSCOM has grown from a small field operation in the early Sixties to a command of over 10,000 personnel watching the life cycle of 12,000 Army aircraft—just 3,000 shy of the Air Force inventory.

5. A detailed look at AVSCOM provides a meaningful insight into Army thinking on aviation and Army's future role in it.

Those who view the helicopter's role as a tactical, short-lived phenomenon suited only for Vietnam-type situations are in for a surprise.

The U.S. Army is in the business of aviation for keeps and, if the present trend continues to its logical conclusion, the Air Force may soon be hard put to justify its tactical air arm.

This conclusion was reached after a Government Executive visit to the Army Aviation System Command (AVSCOM) headquarters in St. Louis. This outfit, part of the Army Materiel Command, is not really "the" headquarters for Army aviation—it's the supply and logistics arm of Army aviation.

AVSCOM is staffed largely by professional Army aviators, men who live for aviation and who influence the direction of research and development, which, of course, sets the pattern for the Army's future air arm.

The Commander of AVSCOM, Maj. Gen. John Klingenhagen, a captain at 19, an aviator proud of his wings and the youngest Army officer to make both brigadier and major general, came alive when the discussion drifted into the future tense.

He picked up the Huey helicopter model from his table and, in the fashion of all aviators, wheeled it through the air displaying its attack and withdrawal profiles. He also spoke of the Cheyenne helicopter and future aircraft for the Army.

His Chief of Staff, Col. Elmore Swenson, added a perspective to Army aviation that one can't get from the many fact sheets, handouts and official briefings available.

The result: a nagging set of questions. Where does Army aviation leave off and the Air Force take over? Is someone viewing developments in both Air Force and Army tactical aviation to define who's in charge of what? Has the Air Force simply forfeited its role in the future of tactical aviation to put its money into manned bombers and ICBMs?

The new breed of helicopters being designed and tested under AVSCOM's charter is, in effect, a new type of fighter plane—big, fast, missile- and gun-equipped and durable.

The term helicopter to most laymen conjures up an image of a light utility craft used for liasion duties. Vietnam, of course, saw the arming of these aircraft, and they play a pivotal role in the war, providing mobility and fire power in a way the Air Force can't.

The Army's present attitude about the future of aviation reminds one of the fight after the Korean War about ground defense of U.S. airbases abroad. This resulted in the Air Force attempting to evolve a set of "ground-pounders" for air base defense—reasoning that the Army forfeited its infantry role in Korea as far as the defense of air bases was concerned.

Thinking of the future, Army aviators seem inclined not to rely on the Air Force. They would apparently prefer to do it themselves and, judging from the plans and programs under way at AVSCOM, they're doing just that.

To call the Cheyenne—which the Army still wants badly—a helicopter is, perhaps, poetic license. It's really a new form of tactical aviation, allegedly suitable for action in conventional war in Europe and even in a nuclear environment.

The Cheyenne is 54 feet long, weighs close to 12,000 pounds and flys at 250 miles per hour. It carries six wing pylons on which either 2.75 inch rocket pods or TOW wire-guided antitank missiles can be mounted.

Its flexible nose turret can be equipped with either an array of 40mm grenade launchers or a six-barrel 7.62 inch mini gun. On its belly a 360-degree swiveling turret is equipped with a 30mm automatic gun.

Researchers at AVSCOM spoke proudly of work under way to give the Cheyenne a day-and-night capability with the help of computers and sophisticated sensor systems.

The trend toward Army developing its own air support began in the late Fifties and early Sixties. Despite intraservice squabbles over the Army and Air Force roles in aviation, the Army has steered onto a course which today seems implicitly geared to evolving an independent air arm directly responsive to infantry needs.

ARMY EVOLVES AIR BRANCH

The Air Force put up a fight when guns were mounted on choppers in Vietnam. It didn't have a reasonable substitute, however, and the guns stayed. Next came the Huey and the Cobra—versatile choppers which evolved from troop transporters into formidable gunships, again providing firepower in a way the Air Force can't.

Then came the Cheyenne, a cross between a powerful jet fighter and a gunship. Its role from concept onward was viewed by Army aviators in a perspective far broader than simply Vietnam.

It perhaps should be stressed that this trend has no earmarks of a conspiratorial one. Rather it seems to have stemmed from a dynamic and zealous leadership convinced of the importance of aviation and bent on doing the best job possible for the Army.

The Cheyenne, once operational, will complete the transition to a full-fledged Army tactical air branch, capable of providing deadly accurate fire support against enemy tanks, fortifications and troops in any battle environment. Army aviators, however, deny that the implications are that broad.

Further down the pike, research and testing now under way at AVSCOM in vertical and short field takeoff aircraft and the "advanced compound helicopter" (with rotor for vertical ascent and props for forward flight) suggest that even more of the traditional Air Force ball park—air logistics—will be invaded ultimately by the Army.

If anything, these developments, not unusual in today's complex military, merely underscore how innocently major trends can emerge. Subjective judgments, obviously, can be made about this particular trend in Army aviation; however, those are for men in responsible positions, not laymen journalists.

An examination of the breadth of activity now under way at AVSCOM reveals in detail the scope of Army thinking and actions in the field of aviation.

Tucked in an ungainly converted warehouse in downtown St. Louis, AVSCOM has grown from a small field unit in the early '60s to an aviation complex numbering almost 10,000 military and civilian personnel. Klingenhagen admitted that its growth was a difficult one.

"A couple of years ago the Command was in chaos. The Commanding General had 41 subordinates reporting directly to his office. You can imagine the constant state of turmoil the front office was in.

"This was changed, however, and now we have eight subordinates reporting to the Commander. To understand what they do you have to understand that we have life-cycle management. It evolves from our basic responsibilities.

"AVSCOM has responsibility for all Army aircraft throughout their life cycle—from the engineer's drawing board to the obsolete aircraft trundled out the back door of the hangar. Primarily AVSCOM is charged with the design, production and maintenance of Army aircraft."

The Army aviation inventory, incidentally, numbers over 12,000 aircraft—just 3,000 shy of the number in the Air Force inventory. Last year, 1969, Army aviators logged 6.7 million flying hours while their Air Force brethren logged 8.5 million. The Navy with an aircraft inventory of about 9,700 only flew 3.7 million.

"AVSCOM's responsibility includes research and initial development of new aircraft, testing of new equipment, contracting for its production, providing repair and maintenance assistance to the field Army and providing international logistic support to other countries using Army aircraft.

"Our research capability—long the weakest link in Army aviation—is getting top priority," Klingenhagen stated. "It was not until the mid-60s that we were given engineering responsibility, and prior to that our laboratory effort was minimal.

"Quite frankly in the case of the Cheyenne helicopter we didn't have the base of knowledge where we could assess the risks involved in the rigid rotor. Our research capability will be built up over the next two to three years however.

"We have recently signed a contract with the Space Administration to establish Army aviation labs at NASA facilities. This will save about $200 million in facilities alone.

ARMY WANTS "CHEYENNE"

"Moreover our joint efforts will fill gaps where NASA research has been weak—the phenomenon of the rotor. We haven't done nearly enough work on the rotor as was evidenced with the Cheyenne flap."

Commenting further on the Cheyenne, Klingenhagen stated: "The production contract has been terminated and the tooling is in storage. The R&D contract, however, continues in effect, and Lockheed is running flight and wind tunnel tests to work out the problems in the rotor control system.

"We're watching the progress of these tests closely. The Army still has a requirement for the Cheyenne and we believe there is a good chance that we'll eventually overcome the problems.

"On the operating end of AVSCOM, we have four deputies to follow Army aircraft through their life cycle—an R&D Division, an Acquisition Division, a Logistic Support Division and a Resource Management Division."

Engineers at the Army Aviation Lab at Fort Eustis, Va., divide their efforts between advanced design, aeromechanics, systems and equipment development and applied aeronautics.

They are now working on advanced V/STOL aircraft and advanced compound helicopters. They are applying the results of propulsion and airframe research to such aircraft as the XH–51A, a rigid rotor compound helicopter that has attained a speed of 302 miles per hour.

They have also modified the Huey helicopter with more streamlined design features and the addition of stub wings and a jet engine to test high-speed helicopter performance.

Moreover, they are experimenting with applying research done in winged transport aircraft with tilt rotors to determine which airframe designs will meet future Army needs.

Turning to the one argument raised about the utility of helicopters in combat—their vulnerability to ground fire—Klingenhagen was defensive:

"The survivability of the helicopter in a combat environment has been a matter of interest, speculation, debate and testing for 20 years.

"During the past eight years Army helicopters have flown about 7.5 million hours in the combat environment of Vietnam. It is most unfortunate that an old belief that the helicopter is a fragile piece of equipment has persisted.

"A few statistics that might help place in perspective the true survivability of the helicopter in combat might be helpful. From 1965 through September 1969, the Army increased its combat flying hours by more than 700 percent and its combat sorties by over 1,000 percent.

"This increase resulted primarily from the growth of our Vietnam inventory, which has gone from 700 in 1965 to over 3,500 helicopters in 1969.

"With the increase in helicopter activity our combat loss rates also increased, although not near the magnitude of the increase in activity.

"Loss rates rose from 12.0 helicopters lost per 100,000 flying hours in 1965 to 16.1 helicopters lost in 1969. We reached our loss peak in 1968 when we suffered almost 18.0 helicopter combat losses per 100,000 flying hours.

"Despite these figures on loss rates, let's also discuss the true survivability of the helicopter in Vietnam.

"For example, let's compare the Army AH–1G helicopter and the UH–1B and C gunships with the Air Force F–100 and F–4 combat losses per 100,000 sorties for 1969.

"The Air Force F–100 and F–4 loss rate is over five times the loss rate of the Army's two attack helicopters. We realize that Air Force sorties are generally longer than helicopter sorties by a factor of perhaps four; however, the combat exposure—the time the aircraft is exposed to enemy fire—is considerably greater per sortie for the helicopter gunship. I believe you will agree these figures show the helicopter to be a pretty tough bird.

"The effects of ground fire will present a good picture of helicopter survivability. On the average, helicopters are hit by enemy ground fire once in 400 flying hours. Of those helicopters hit, one is shot down in every 4,300 hours flown. Of all the helicopters hit and shot down, only one is lost on over 7,700 hours flown.

"Personal survivability in terms of crew members is of constant concern to everyone. An examination of crew member survivability versus the combat infantryman shows that aviation personnel fair considerably better—about four times as good as the infantryman.

"There are many instances of helicopters taking over 25 rounds of enemy automatic weapons fire at a single time and remaining in the air. The first OH–6 Cayuse helicopter to complete 1,000 hours of combat flying had been shot down five times and recovered, received fire on 57 occasions and had survived 150 bullet strikes."

In conversation, Klingenhagen stressed that the Army is not working toward establishing an aviation branch. Rather, he emphasized that the flying elements in the Army are to be integrated into the present structure to better support the ground troops.

"Air mobility has gained respectability and so has the firepower we can provide. During the '70s we will be striving to increase our firepower support to ground troops.

"Moreover, we want to provide much more mobility to all echelons. In Vietnam we started out with each Division Commander having his own chopper to get above the action and get a better view. We finally worked this air mobility concept down to the battalion level.

"In the future we want to get it down to the company level. The helicopter is a true substitute for the horse.

"With aviation integrated into the ground forces, we can achieve a closer degree of battlefield cooperation with our air elements. We can place fire more accurately and stay on target longer. We can cut down the waiting time for air support and, with aviation integrated into the ground units, we can better anticipate our air support needs on the spot—outthinking the enemy and keeping a step ahead of him.

"If Army Aviation is to make progress in the '70s," Klingenhagen asserted, "we have to pay the price of more sophisticated machines. Of course we may not have to buy as many to do the job. The three primary areas of concern for the coming decade will be providing more firepower, more mobility and a heavier lift capability."

THE NOMINATION OF JUDGE GEORGE HARROLD CARSWELL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, one of the most valuable assets a man can possess is experience. It is through experience that men learn, mature, and develop wisdom. The world has learned that the value of mature men is not their age but that they have observed through the years various phenomenon and have thereby gained insight and understanding; but is better described as experience.

In Judge George Harrold Carswell, we find a man of experience.

Indeed, he has had considerable experience for a man of so few years. Judge Carswell was born in Irwinton, Ga., 51 years ago. He attended public school in Irwinton, Atlanta, and Bainbridge, Ga., before entering Duke University in 1937. He graduated from Duke University 4 years later and engaged himself in the study of law at the University of Georgia. His career as a legal scholar was interrupted by the advent of World War II. Upon returning from that conflict, Judge Carswell resumed his study of jurisprudence and graduated from the school of law at Mercer University in June 1948.

His tour of duty from 1942 until the end of the war included service aboard the U.S.S. Baltimore with both the 3d and 5th Fleets during engagements at Taiwan, Kwajalein, and Iwo Jima. In March 1945 he transferred to the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis where he did postgraduate work. He left the service in November of that year with the rank of lieutenant.

An acquaintanceship with the intricacies and subtle fine points of the law was not the only experience gained by the judge during his tenure at Mercer. While there he taught undergraduate English, edited a weekly newspaper, organized a telephone company, and served as president of the student government.

Truly the fact of his ability to engage in such a diverse and demanding extracurricular schedule demonstrates his great industry and an unusual capacity for productive endeavor at an early age.

In 1948, as a young lawyer, he ran for the Georgia State Legislature. Although he was defeated, there can be no question that the seeking of an elected office is an experience of inestimable value: It teaches one humility, gives a sense of perspective, and acquaints one with the vital issues of the day.

Moving to Tallahassee in 1949, he entered private law practice as an associate in the firm of Leroy Collins where he remained until 1951 when he organized the firm of Carswell, Cotton & Shrivers. Thereafter, he continued practice until his appointment as U.S. attorney in July 1953.

Judge Carswell proved to be a competent and able Federal advocate and in 1958 became the chief judge of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Florida. At the time of his appointment to the Federal bench, he was the youngest member of the Federal judiciary in the United States.

In mid-June 1969, Judge Carswell was appointed to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, a post which he now holds.

Mr. President, we can see that Judge Carswell has had experience as a student, a soldier, a teacher, lawyer, U.S. attorney, Federal district judge, and Federal appellate judge.

If no other factors were present, these experiences alone would qualify this man for the position to which he has been nominated.

However, let us look a bit further at the experiences of the nominee.

During his years on the Federal bench, Judge Carswell has been unusually active in the field of judicial administration. He has served as a member of both the Judicial Conference's Committee on Statistics, which plays an important role in recommending to Congress the creation of additional Federal judgeships, and its committee on personnel, which deals with problems relating to the administration of the judiciary. In April 1969, Judge Carswell was chosen by the circuit and district judges of the fifth circuit as the circuit's district judge representative to the Judicial Conference. As such, he attended and participated in the meeting of the conference held in June 1969, dealing with the problems of judicial ethics arising from outside employment of Federal judges. He voted with the majority of the committee to require disclosure of outside employment, and to regulate it in other ways.

It would seem clear, therefore, that Judge Carswell has realized great knowledge and ability through his varied experiences.

The record compiled by Judge Carswell as a jurist indicates that he has presided over a variety of different types of cases ranging from administrative law to wrongful death, including such subjects as civil rights, criminal law, habeas corpus, labor law, and other areas as complex as taxation and insurance.

Sometimes people forget that the Supreme Court hears a number of cases each year that do not involve civil rights and criminal law. Judge Carswell's experience in treating with different subjects will be of great benefit to the Court.

A review of the decisions he has written or participated in demonstrate his ability to single out the issue of the case, bring together the facts and applicable law, and succinctly state the conclusion with brevity and exactness. This style of writing judicial opinions is somewhat unique today, for the opinions of many of our judges are too long and superfluous. This style of legal writing indicates that Judge Carswell is capable of exactness in considering and interpreting a question of law. This ability certainly commends him to the position for which he has been selected.

Mr. President, so far I have made certain observations concerning the experience, knowledge, and ability of the candidate under consideration for confirmation to the Supreme Court as Associate Justice.

I ask my colleagues, are my observations and conclusions correct? Are they reflected by others who have turned an objective eye toward the nominee?

In evaluating the qualifications of Judge Carswell, the Judiciary Committee received the opinion of the American Bar Association. Lawrence E. Walsh, a former Federal judge and chairman of the American Bar Association's prestigious standing committee on the Federal judiciary, reported by letter to the Judiciary Committee:

> On the basis of its investigation the committee has concluded, unanimously, that Judge Carswell is qualified for appointment as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In his letter, Judge Walsh explained the nature of the examination which had led to that conclusion by stating that the committee's opinion was based upon the views of a cross section of the best informed lawyers and judges as to the integrity, judicial temperament, and professional competence of the nominee.

The high esteem in which Judge Carswell is held by his colleagues is further demonstrated by the fact that several of his fellow circuit judges have submitted letters to the Judiciary Committee in support of the nomination. Judge Robert A. Ainsworth, Jr., stated in his letter that "undoubtedly he will bring distinction, credit, and honor to our Highest Court." Judge Warren L. Jones praised Judge Carswell "as eminently qualified in every way: personality, integrity, legal learning, and judicial temperament for the Supreme Court of the United States." Judge Bryan Simpson and Homer Thornberry expressed the same opinion. These commendations given Judge Carswell by his colleagues are impressive indeed.

Mr. President, on the basis of the objective record, no man can rationally conclude that Judge Carswell is not qualified by experience on the Federal bench to serve on the Highest Federal Bench as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

There are those who would make the incredulous argument that because Judge Carswell has not written a number of law review articles he is not qualified to sit on the Supreme Court. The writing of articles for law reviews has never been and is not now a prerequisite to confirmations to the Supreme Court. Further, the position has been asserted by certain smug and self-righteous, self-styled experts on the Court that the quality of legal education dispensed at any law school other than at certain ones in the northeastern section of this country is less than acceptable for candidates to the High Court. This argument is the result of prejudice and snobbishness, and should be rejected out of hand. To proffer such a postulate as a legitimate criteria for judging candidates for the High Court is folly—law schools can only be judged by the performance of their graduates, and you may rest assured that no single law school in the Nation has any monopoly on good graduates.

So much for the trite arguments that have been bantered about as to his judicial qualifications.

Mr. President, the ugly specter of racism has been deliberately raised by certain opponents of Judge Carswell. It could be suspected with reasonable accuracy that those people who have raised these arguments would be opposed to Judge Carswell or any nominee solely on the basis of his being from the South, and not having spent his life apologizing for the fact.

The ostensible basis for the charge of bigotry is a statement made by Judge Carswell when he was a candidate for the Georgia Legislature in 1948. This is over two decades ago, and he has categorically renounced that unfortunate utterance.

Like drowning men clutching at straws, the enemies of the nomination point to a charter to a country club and a deed to a house which allegedly proved the prejudice of Judge Carswell. The record bears vivid testimony to the abject failure of the evidence contained within these documents to indict him for racism. Former Florida Gov. Leroy Collins, a man possessing impeccable liberal credentials, stated before the Judiciary Committee:

> Judge Carswell, Gentleman, is no racist. He is no white supremist. He is no segregationist. I am convinced of this.

Let me point out that Governor Collins also owned an interest in the country club in question, and no one has ever hinted or suggested that that fact proved he was a racist. If it does not prove that Leroy Collins was a racist, Mr. President, it does not prove that Judge Carswell was a racist. Further, the list of prominent Americans of all political persuasions who have committed these particular sins is so long as to make this argument worthless.

Prof. James W. Moore, Sterling professor of law at Yale University, before the Judiciary Committee, recounted having met Judge Carswell while being consulted in connection with the Carswell record in racial cases, saying:

> If this were not so serious, this charge of racism against Judge Carswell, it would almost be funny. By that I mean it is certainly ironic, because you know in Florida many people regard certain parts of the Northern District of Florida as a little bit to the right of Louis the 14th, and I can tell this committee in all sincerity and honesty that Harrold Carswell has displayed unusual courage I think and faithfulness to the law that he serves in his civil rights rulings, in an altogether hostile climate.
> I think he is a very strong man. I was shocked to read the speech, the young man's speech he made, because in all of my dealings with Harrold Carswell including the Brooks case I would have thought he was just the opposite, and most people who had dealings with him in Tallahassee feel that he is indeed a fine judge. He believes in liberty and justice for all, and there is no two ways about it.
> My particular reason for writing you at this time is that I am fully convinced that the recent reporting of a speech he made in 1948 may give an erroneous impression of his personal and judicial philosophy and I would be prepared to express this conviction of mine based upon my observations of him during the years I was privileged to serve as chief judge of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Judge Bryan Simpson of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals praised Judge Carswell as a legal craftsman and then added:

> More important even than the fine skill as a judicial craftsman possessed by Judge Carswell are his qualities as a man: Superior intelligence, patience, a warm and generous interest in his fellow man of all races and creeds, judgment and an openminded disposition to hear, consider and decide important matters without preconceptions, predilections, or prejudices. I have always found him to be completely objective and detached in his approach to his judicial duties.

Judge Homer Thornberry observed:

> Judge Carswell has the compassion which is so important in a judge.

Mr. President, a group of northern lawyers testified before the committee that they had gone to Florida to represent civil rights plaintiffs in Judge Carswell's court, and that he had evidenced hostility toward them and their clients. These charges were handily rebutted by the statements of several individuals.

Mr. Charles F. Wilson, Negro civil rights attorney who represented criminal and civil rights litigants before Judge Carswell stated:

> As a black lawyer frequently involved with representation of plaintiffs in civil rights cases in his court, there was not a single instance in which he was ever rude or discourteous to me, and I received fair and courteous treatment from him on all such occasions. I represented the plaintiffs in three of the major school desegregation cases filed in his district. He invariably granted the plaintiffs favorable judgments in these cases, and the only disagreement I had with him in any of them was over the extent of the relief to be granted.

One of the most persuasive arguments against the charge of racism was made in a letter by Mr. Allen L. Levine of the State of Massachusetts which was addressed to the Honorable F. BRADFORD MORSE, a Member of the House of Representatives from that State. The letter is long and so I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. Levine was in the Navy with Judge Carswell and the essence of this testimony is found in a few sentences which I shall read:

> My own position is this: I have no ax to grind for or against whatever position the Senators may take, but I hope that you may find useful the opinions of a concerned constituent who happens to have had some extended personal contact with Judge Carswell. My opinion is that Judge Carswell was not and is not a racist or bigot.

Mr. President, just as in a former hearing on the same subject, the Judiciary Committee tolerated an entourage of self-styled experts on the law, some of whom were not lawyers, who spewed forth their venom against Judge Carswell.

Each one assured the committee that he had objectively reviewed the record of the nominee and had reached the conclusion that he was unqualified and they were opposed to him. Mr. President, is there anyone so naive that he would believe that the opposition to this man is based on any rational or objective foundation?

These witnesses concentrated primarily on the school desegregation cases handled by Judge Carswell. This fact in itself clearly demonstrates their lack of objectivity, for Judge Carswell has dealt with a number of different kinds of cases and yet they were not mentioned in the testimony.

The basic belief of the ultraliberal is that if a law is bad it is not to be obeyed. This sort of premise leads directly to the destruction of our republican form of government and ultimately to anarchy.

The criticism of those who oppose Judge Carswell is based on the premise that a judge should not support or obey a law which in their opinion is bad but should go beyond the law and through the process of opinion writing destroy the existing law and impose in its place his own brand of law.

Judge Carswell's treatments of the issues before him have been in accordance of the law as it was at the time the matter was in his court. In this context I call attention to an article that appeared in the New York Times written by Fred P. Graham. The article is a lengthy one and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. THURMOND. This article bears witness, as do the decisions of Judge Carswell, to the fact that Judge Carswell understands and practices the proper role of a jurist as it should be practiced in our system of government; namely, that he is to apply the law, not as it should be, or used to be, or ought to be, but as it is.

Mr. President, look at the record. This man is no zealot and yet he is accused of being a racist and of being incompetent by some people who are zealots. The ultra-liberals have come here mouthing the pretty platitudes of the left, both old and new, but after one removes the slick veneer from his pious pronouncements of objectivity it is readily obvious that they simply oppose anyone who will not rule their way in every case, every time, even if it means complete disregard of the rule, letter, and spirit of the law. The opposition posed by these individuals is purely political and without substance.

Mr. President, this man is qualified, both as a student and practitioner of the law. The Senate has confirmed his nomination to high Federal positions three times, two of which nominations were to the Federal bench. In doing so, this body has gone on record as approving his qualifications to sit on the Federal bench.

Some time ago, the ultra-liberals in this country decided that Congress would not go along with all of their ill-conceived visionary schemes, so they turned to the other branches of Government and found the courts most vulnerable to their arguments. They have enjoyed a virtual monopoly on judicial appointments until this administration, and they have reacted by vicious and unwarranted attacks on President Nixon's appointments.

The American judicial system is the backbone of our Republic, because the court is the place where the citizen can redress his grievances, sue his Government, and right his wrongs without force or violence. To undermine the court is to undermine the Nation, and to destroy the court is to destroy the Nation.

So we come to the crux of the matter—if Carswell or any other strict constructionist is denied a seat on the Court, it will remain outside the constitutional boundaries set by our forefathers; but if Judge Carswell is confirmed, then a balance will be effected on the High Tribunal, and the system of checks and balances will again function within the constitutional framework.

Mr. President, we must look to the dangers of refusing confirmation. Congress legislates; the Executive legislates through Executive orders, regulations, and bureaucratic fiat; and the Supreme Court has taken upon itself to legislate. Where, indeed, is our system of checks and balances? It appears that it is dormant, but it must be revived and renewed. The only way to resurrect these checks and balances is to balance the court, and it will require the placing of a strict constructionist such as Judge Carswell on the Supreme Court to accomplish this purpose. By confirming Judge Carswell, we shall accomplish more than fill a vacancy on the Supreme Court; we shall by that action reaffirm our belief in the American system of checks and balances.

Mr. President, I support the confirmation of Judge George Harrold Carswell to be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court and I call on my colleagues to support President Nixon in his choice of this able and dedicated American.

JANUARY 24, 1970.

Hon. F. BRADFORD MORSE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BRAD: Although I realize that you will not be called upon to vote on the confirmation of Judge G. Harrold Carswell, I am writing to you to share information which may be of some interest to those who will be required to decide how to vote on the matter.

You have no doubt read that Judge Carswell served in the United States Navy during World War II. He and I reported for duty aboard the U.S.S. Baltimore early in 1943 at the Fore River Works in Quincy, Mass. We were both newly-commissioned ensigns, and we were put in the junior officers bunkroom together with about twenty other civilians in uniform.

The Baltimore shook down in the Caribbean, then went to the Pacific and operated as part of the fast carrier striking force screen, participating in all the invasions of the Central Pacific campaign, Gilberts, Marshalls, Saipan, Guam, Iwo, Philippines, Okinawa—interrupted only by a return to the West Coast in August, 1944 to pick up President Roosevelt and take him to Pearl Harbor to meet with General MacArthur and Admiral Nimitz.

George Carswell and I were aboard all during that period, until he was detached in February, 1945, to attend staff school, and I was aboard until May, 1945, when I was ordered to Japanese Language School. We were promoted to junior grade lieutenants and moved out of the J.O. bunkroom and into a cabin for two officers, where we were roommates for about a year. We had a chance to learn each other's views during a period when we were both under a good deal of combat-generated emotional pressure. I think that under such circumstances a lot of basic human values become evident, and during that year we talked about everything under the sun—education, politics, philosophy, sex, history, movies and anything else that came to mind.

During all that time, I never heard George utter any point of view that could be described as racist or illiberal. His attitude was a truly humanistic and liberal one in that he reacted to people as individuals and not as stereotypes. This was especially apparent in his behavior toward black sailors. At that time Navy policy was segregationist, and black sailors afloat could only serve in the wardroom mess as stewards mates. There were other officers of Southern origin who were outspokenly antagonistic to the steward's mates for racial reasons, but George Carswell was always pleasant and considerate to all. Our Gunnery Officer, Comdr. Truesdell, felt that the steward's mates ought to be given the opportunity to serve in a more meaningful capacity, and saw to it that their station at general quarters was to man a battery of 20 millimeter anti-aircraft guns. While other officers questioned the desirability of this, George Carswell was enthusiastically in favor of it.

I remember that once during a shore excursion in the forward area George and I together encountered for the first time a black petty officer, evidence that at long last the Navy was beginning to move away from its segregationist policies, and George could see the wisdom of that too.

In view of the attacks on Judge Carswell's legal philosophy by civil libertarians, and especially in view of the pro-segregationist views expressed in his campaign for election to the state house of representatives from a rural constituency in Georgia in 1948, which he recently has firmly and, I am convinced, sincerely repudiated, I am sure that members of the Senate must be subject to pressure to vote against his confirmation to the Supreme Court. At the same time I am sure that the Administration would welcome an expression of regularity and support by an affirmative vote.

My own position is this: I have no axe to grind for or against whatever position Senators may take, but I hope that you may find useful the opinion of a concerned constituent who happens to have had some extended personal conflict with Judge Carswell. My opinion is that Judge Carswell was not and is not a racist or a bigot. He is a warm, friendly, outgoing person, extremely intelligent, and about as liberal as the Southern milieu into which he was born could produce at that time. I have no fear of his subverting past actions and decisions of the Court should his appointment be confirmed. While I do not think that his elevation to the Court would warrant the probability of his development into a liberal of the Hugo Black variety, neither do I believe that we should fear the emergence of a modern Roger B. Taney. Out of personal knowledge and affection for George Carswell as I knew him during the war, I am happy to be able to give some justification for a favorable consideration of his appointment.

Sincerely yours,

ALLAN L. LEVINE,
Executive Vice President, Towers Motor Parts Corp., Lowell, Mass.

CARSWELL'S CREDO IS RESTRAINT

(By Fred P. Graham)

WASHINGTON, January 20.—Judge G. Harrold Carswell, President Nixon's new nominee to the Supreme Court, has a virtually unblemished record as the type of "strict constructionist" that Mr. Nixon promised to appoint when he campaigned for the Presidency.

In speeches across the country, Mr. Nixon promised to name men to the high court who would "interpret" the law, not "make" it.

In 11 years as a Federal District judge in Tallahassee, Fla., and in six months as a member of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, Judge Carswell sprinkled the lawbooks with opinions on matters ranging from civil rights to the legality of Florida's poultry law.

Throughout these opinions runs a consistent tendency to view the law as a neutral device for settling disputes, and not as a force for either legal innovation or social change.

AN IRONIC COMPARISON

An ironic byproduct of this consistency is that Judge Carswell's judicial record is more conservative than that of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth Jr., who was defeated for confirmation to the same seat by liberal forces that branded him as a conservative who was "not a contemporary man of the times."

Judge Haynsworth was ahead of the Supreme Court in devising fuller review for state prisoners in Federal habeas corpus proceedings, and occasionally anticipated the high court in ruling in favor of Negroes in civil rights cases.

An exact comparison with Judge Carswell is difficult, as the new nominee served as a trial judge much of the time, and most of his opinions dealt with day-to-day issues rather than sweeping constitutional matters. But the lawbooks contain at least 25 appellate opinions he wrote when he sat, as District judges frequently do, on the Court of Appeals.

These opinions reveal a jurist who hesitates to use judicial power unless the need is clear and demanding; who finds few controversies that cannot be settled by invoking some settled precedent, and who rarely finds the need to refer to the social conflict outside the courtroom that brought his cases before him.

ATTITUDE OF RESTRAINT

This attitude of restraint has generated friction only in the field of civil rights, where Judge Carswell's policy of sticking with settled precedents until change came from higher courts had the result of allowing dilatory school officials to delay segregation.

An example was provided when parents of Negro children in the Pensacola area sued to break up the segregation of faculty and staffs in the formerly all-black school. Although the higher courts had not said in so many words that faculty, as well as student, segregation must end, lawyers for the Negroes argued that these courts could not have meant that the newly integrated schools would be staffed with all-black and all-white faculties. Judge Carswell ruled otherwise.

"The Brown cases," he wrote, referring to the Supreme Court's landmark school decisions of 1954 and 1955, "hold that the segregation of white and Negro children on the basis of race denies to Negro children equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution." He put the word "children" in italics, and went on to state that these decisons and subsequent ones by the Fifth Circuit did not reach the question of faculty desegregation.

NOT DIRECTLY AT ISSUE

"This court can not indulge in a presumption that these Federal courts decided the points of law asserted by plaintiff by inference," he said, because staff members' rights were not directly at issue in those cases.

Finally, he declared, students have no standing to intervene in such matters: "Students herein can no more complain of injury to themselves of the selection or assignment of teachers than they can bring action to enjoin the assignment to the school of teachers who were too strict or too lenient."

Some civil rights lawyers who have appeared before Judge Carswell have charged that his tendency to issue declaratory judgments rather than injunctions—to hand down limited desegregation orders rather than sweeping ones—was a convenient use of judicial self-restraint to cloak segregationist sympathies.

Leroy D. Clark, a professor of law at New York University, who formerly headed the operations of the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., in northern Florida, asserted in an interview today that Judge Carswell had repeatedly delayed school cases by failing to rule until pressed to do so, and then by often issuing decisions that were palpably wrong and quickly reversed.

"We would have a hearing and it would take several months for him to rule," Mr. Clark said. "I would have to file a motion to ask him 'would you please rule?'—which is outrageous.

"It was my view that of the Federal District judges I appeared before, Harrold Carswell was clearly the most openly and blatantly segregationist. He was a clever and an intelligent man, so that when he was wrong on the law it wasn't because he didn't know what the law was—it was because he was biased."

* * * wrote a political science dissertation in 1968 that analyzed the civil rights decisions of the 31 Federal District judges appointed to posts in the Deep South between 1953 and 1963.

When she ranked the 31 judges in terms of the number of times they had ruled in favor of Negro plaintiffs' position, Judge Carswell ranked 23d. Her study showed that, of his civil rights decisions to be appealed, 60 per cent were reversed.

In most of these cases, Judge Carswell would have had to move beyond clearly settled precedents to rule in favor of the civil rights position. When these precedents have existed, He has struck down segregation in crisp forthright opinions.

In 1965, he declared that the barber shop in Tallahassee's Duval Hotel had to serve Negroes under the public accommodations provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

He brushed aside a barber's assertion that he was not covered because 95 per cent of the customers were local people and not guests in the hotel. "From a reading of the act it is clear," Judge Carswell observed, "that relative percentages of local, as compared to transient, customers may not be used as criteria to determine coverage."

PROSPECTS BRIGHTER

In 1960 when Tallahassee Negroes sued to desegregate the counters, waiting rooms and restrooms in the city-owned airport, he did not hesitate to order desegregation.

Even though Judge Carswell's civil rights record may be fully as objectionable to civil rights forces as that of Judge Haynsworth, the new nominee's prospects for confirmation seem much brighter, partly because he has not antagonized organized labor as Judge Haynsworth had.

Federal District Judges rarely rule on labor cases, which are usually appealed from the National Labor Relations Board directly to a Court of Appeals.

Tom Harris, the official of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations who led the successful attack against Judge Haynsworth, said today that Judge Carswell "doesn't appear to have a significant record on labor cases." He said the AFL–CIO had no plans at present to oppose him.

The few labor opinions that Judge Carswell has written reflect his reticence to use judicial power and his tendency not to extend the judiciary's power.

SOME DISSENTING OPINIONS

In one decision, when a three-judge Court of Appeals ordered a soft-drink company to comply with the minimum wage laws, he dissented, saying: "It is my view that the injunctive power of courts should never be invoked lightly, nor should it be converted into a mere ministerial function triggered automatically upon the finding of an infraction of the law."

Judge Carswell's opinions tend to be bloodless documents, setting out the facts and the precedents, then briskly coming to a conclusion that is said to be within the precedents.

He is not given to broad statements of his philosophy, but his creed at this point in his career seems to have been summed up in one statement from an opinion he wrote shortly after he became a judge in 1958: "Established law, with its imperfections, must nonetheless be applied as it is and not on the predilections of the court."

WHY THE LONG DELAY IN RELEASING THE LAOS TESTIMONY

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, it is now more than 5 months since the Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee on U.S. Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad completed its hearings on Laos.

The record of those hearings remains classified top secret at the insistence of the State Department. That record contains a great deal of information about U.S. activities in Laos which the American people should know and have a right to know. Repeated attempts on the part of the subcommittee to persuade the State Department to declassify portions of the record, however, have been to no avail.

We want it to be clear, Mr. President, that we have never suggested the entire record should be published. I agree it contains some material which should not be published. But it contains a great deal of material which should be published if the American people are to maintain that proper confidence in their Government.

Almost daily the press makes more revelations—or raises more questions—about what is going on in Laos, and in Thailand as it affects Laos.

The Washington Star, in a dispatch by Henry S. Bradsher from Udorn, Thailand, March 15, described how the air war in Laos is run out of seven bases in Thailand, sometimes with unmarked planes.

The Washington Post on March 16, in a dispatch by T. D. Allman from Vientiane, reported in detail how 12 Americans were killed 2 years ago defending a secret air navigation facility at Phou Pha Thi, Laos.

The Washington Star on March 17, in a dispatch by Tammy Arbuckle, described the evacuation of Sam Thong, Laos, by Air America. This story went on to say that there have been approximately 70 Americans in the Sam Thong-Long Chien area armed with M–16 rifles and captured Communist AK–47 submachineguns.

In a dispatch from Vientiane March 20, the Associated Press reported that two Thai battalions have been flown to Long Chien in U.S. civil aircraft to help defend that Army base from an expected North Vietnamese onslaught.

On March 23, a story from Bangkok by Jack Foisie in the Washington Post described other Thai activities in Laos. According to this story, two Thai artillery battalions were used in Laos last year under American auspices during the defense of Muong Soui. Further, according to Mr. Foisie, Thai pilots have flown T–28 bomber planes, and Thai observers fly in spotter planes to direct artillery fire and bomber strikes.

On March 22, the Associated Press had the Thai Premier himself admitting that some volunteers may have gone to Laos.

On March 23, the Christian Science Monitor stated flatly, "A Thai artillery battalion is operating in Laos with the support of the United States."

And finally, on March 25 a story from Vientiane in the Washington Star described in some detail an American-directed secret army which operates all through Southeast Asia.

I ask unanimous consent that the full texts of the newsstories to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I again urge the State Department to agree to telling the American people the facts. What the Thais may or may not be doing in Laos is a matter between the Thais and the Laotians—unless the United States is paying for it, in which case it becomes a legitimate matter of public concern for the citizens of the United States.

The President himself stated it best in his televised address of November 3 last year:

> The American people cannot and should not be asked to support a policy which involves the overriding issues of war and peace unless they know the truth about that policy.

UDORN AIR BASE IN THAILAND U.S. MAINSTAY IN LAOS FIGHT

(By Henry S. Bradsher)

UDORN, THAILAND.—When President Nixon admitted nine days ago the well-known fact that the U.S. Air Force is flying combat support missions for the government of Laos, he did not mention where the bases are.

The biggest of them is on the southern edge of this dusty northeast Thailand town.

The 36 F4D Phantom supersonic fighter-bombers stationed at Udorn fly day and night to attack North Vietnamese forces in Laos.

They also escort Udorn's unarmed RF4C Phantom reconnaissance planes over Laos and North Vietnam. They are authorized to attack antiaircraft weapons in North Vietnam if fired on—or perhaps if they only expect to be fired on; Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird refused to clarify this point when he was in Saigon last month.

The Udorn base is also busy with helicopter units, C47 "Spooky" gunships and some other ground-support firepower planes, not all of which are marked with U.S. Air Force insignia, and shuttles of supporting transport planes.

And sharing the 10,000-foot runway is Air America, the airline created by the Central Intelligence Agency to provide logistical support for Lao government forces.

The base is officially known as Udorn Royal Thai Air Force Base, and the 6,500 U.S. military men here are guests of the Thai government.

The official base commander is Thai Lt. Col. Jaru Sanguanphokai. He commands a Thai Force squadron of propellor-driven T28s stationed here.

U.S. officials are careful to avoid anything which might imply Thailand lacks control of Udorn or the other six air bases used by the United States in this country. They do not want to give offense that might, among other things, become a cause for Thailand's restricting American activities.

But at the moment the Thai attitude seems to be the opposite.

Rather than being worried about Americans exceeding their authorization here, the Thai government fears that public opinion in the United States—or at least senatorial criticism—might cause a restriction of air operations over Laos from Thai bases.

Thailand wants a maximum U.S. air effort to check the North Vietnamese dry-season offensive in Laos. Laos lies just across the Mekong River from Thailand and this country sees itself threatened.

ANXIETY NOT RELIEVED

The current lull in the offensive while the Lao Communists propose peace talks has not relieved the anxiety in Bangkok. One top official there described it as "a diplomatic offensive to go with the military offensive."

Thai concern over Lao air war criticism in the United States means a continuation of the sensitivity which always has marked U.S. Air Force operations here, but for a reversed reason.

Originally, the United States was secretive about its Thai operations to avoid embarrassing the government in Bangkok. Although 80 percent of the U.S. air strikes against North Vietnam were flown from Thailand, this country did not want to appear too committed to Washington.

In the case of Lao operations, there also has been the same consideration which long kept Washington mum about American activities. That was the theoretical neutrality of Laos under the 1962 Geneva agreement.

HISTORY OF BASE

Those who get Thai government permission to visit the U.S. Air Force at Udorn—not an easy thing to do—are given a history of the base which only begins in 1964.

In May 1964, the State Department confirmed that U.S. reconnaissance flights were being made over Laos at the request of the Lao government, then as now fighting North Vietnamese troops.

A few days later, after a fighter-bomber had been shot down, the State Department confirmed that armed escort was being flown for the reconnaissance planes and the escorts were allowed to shoot back if fired upon.

For six years that was the official explanation of Phantom fighter operations over Laos from Udorn and other American planes' Lao operations from other Thai bases.

INTERDICTORY MISSIONS

But on March 6 Nixon said that in May 1964, U.S. planes "began flying certain interdictory missions against invaders" of Laos. That means bombing North Vietnamese.

The United States, he said, has continued "to fly combat support missions for Laotian forces." The North Vietnamese offensive has caused an increase in missions, making Udorn busier than it has been since the bombing of North Vietnam ended in 1968.

Nixon's statement has not yet filtered down through channels to provide a more comprehensive explanation of what goes on from Udorn. U.S. officers here are cautiously noncommittal and they let visitors look but not talk to people.

The 1964 date is deceptive.

A plaque on the wall of the U.S. consulate here marks eight years of Air America operations from Udorn—March 1961 to March 1969.

This base was obviously a key point in U.S. support for Lao anti-Communist forces long before Washington was asked in 1964 to help the government legally established in Vientiane by the 1962 agreement.

That long support from here reflects long Thai concern over the danger of Laos falling completely under Communist control.

On April 1, 1961, the Chinese Communist newspaper, People's Daily, complained that "the United States has built an Air Force base capable of handling large aircraft at Udorn in Thailand, only 50 miles away from Vientiane across the Mekong River . . ."

It was to Udorn that U.S. Marines, helicopters and weapons were rushed in 1962 when the North Vietnamese rout of Lao forces at Nam Tha, in northwest Laos, panicked the Bangkok government. The Marines later left.

GUERRILLAS TRAINED

The Air America date of March 1961 is about the time the first U.S. Special Forces teams went into Laos to train Lao guerrillas—what have become today the "secret army" of Gen. Vang Pao. These guerrillas could not exist without Air America's aerial support.

Recently Air America advertised in the Bangkok Post for Thias to work in Udorn at a long list of jobs, mostly technical ones like aircraft mechanics. Two job listings, however, were "stock control clerks with military supply experience" and "supply storekeepers with military warehouse activities experience."

U.S. military supplies trucked from ports on the Gulf of Siam are flown by Air America to hazardous little air strips in the Lao mountains.

The separately fenced Air America part of the air base has a wide variety of planes, from small liaison craft to four-engined transports. Some are marked "Air America," some have no markings.

USED TO TRAIN PILOTS

A few unmarked T28s are used by Air America to train Lao Air Force pilots. T28s, slow old planes originally built as trainers, are used by Laos to bomb enemy positions.

The Lao T28 operations have to be coordinated with U.S. Air Force strikes in Laos, which are ordered from Saigon. Udorn is a link in the control system, which ends with U.S. Air Force officers stationed at Lao T28 bases up and down Laos.

Udorn is the headquarters for the 7–13 Air Force, which directs all U.S. Air Force activities in Thailand.

It comes under the 7th Air Force at Saigon's Tan Son Nhut Air Base for operational matters and under the 13th Air Force at Clark Field, the Philippines, for logistical support.

The A1 Skyraider prop-driven fighter-bomber that was shot down over northern Laos Tuesday, and announced as part of the post-March 6 policy of reporting American losses in Laos, came from Nakhon Phanom Royal Thai Air Force Base.

Located on the Mekong River border with Laos 80 miles east of Udorn, it is directly linked with Udorn operations.

On five-minute standby at Nakhon Phanom is a team of two rescue helicopters, a transport plane to refuel the copters in the air and direct them, and four A1s to provide covering fire during a rescue. Such a team brought back Tuesday's downed A1 crew.

Last August and September, when the U.S. use of Thai bases was being much discussed in Washington to the displeasure of the Thai government, a reduction of American activity here was envisaged. Vietnamization seemed to make it possible.

But at the moment there is no indication that Udorn or the other six bases will slow down. While Vietnam was the consideration then, Laos has been added now as a main—perhaps the main—factor.

Under a Sept. 30 agreement, 4,500 U.S. military personnel have been withdrawn from the 48,000 then in Thailand. A total of 6,000 is scheduled to be gone by July.

Officials say the 6,000 are mostly Army construction troops whose job is done but include some Air Force units flying obsolescent support planes.

Any further reduction would begin to cut into U.S. capabilities to support the Lao and South Vietnamese wars. And the mood of worry over Laos in Bangkok makes that seem as undesirable for the Thai government as it seems from here to be for Nixon.

So the hot, now dusty but soon muddy air base here at Udorn is likely to go on making the claim of being the busiest in Southeast Asia.

12 AMERICANS DIED IN LOSS OF SECRET LAOTIAN OUTPOST

(By T. D. Allman)

VIENTIANE, March 15.—More than a dozen Americans were killed in Laos two years ago when Communist troops overran a secret American installation that assisted U.S. bombing of North Vietnam. The incident has been kept a secret.

In his March 6 statement on Laos, President Nixon said, "No American stationed in Laos has ever been killed in ground combat operations."

The sentence, although carefully phrased to exclude casualties in the American air war in Laos and U.S. military personnel who have fought in Laos from U.S. bases in South Vietnam and Thailand, failed to cover scores of Americans performing military and military supported functions on the ground in Laos who have been killed in combat with North Vietnamese and Pathet Lao troops.

[Speaking with newsmen Friday. White House spokesman Ronald L. Ziegler said there were "some" U.S. casualties in Laos besides the announced death of Army Capt. Joseph K. Bush Jr. Without saying how many, Ziegler said "some of the casualties would be U.S. civilians, some would be U.S. military."]

The most costly of these engagements, according to long-time Laos residents, occurred just two years ago, when more than a dozen Americans were killed defending an American radar, reconnaissance and rescue base in extreme northeastern Laos that guided U.S. aircraft to their targets and electronically released their bomb loads by radio.

The installation was called Phou Pha Thi.

Phou Pha Thi is a 5,860-foot-high mountain, 190 miles northeast of Vientiane and about 160 miles west of Hanoi, in Lao's Communist-dominated Samneua Province ("Phou" is the Laotian word for mountain). Phou Pha Thi, one of the highest and most isolated mountains in the hilly northeast, lies within 15 miles of the North Vietnamese frontier in a province that was granted to the Pathet Lao in 1954 as a regroupment area.

Phou Pha Thi, like most of the mountains of northeast Laos, is largely limestone. It rises up sheer on three sides. The fourth side also steep but negotiable, rises more than 1,600 feet from a valley.

The mountain was controlled by Meo partisans of the CIA-organized Clandestine Army until March 1968.

In August 1964, following the Gulf of Tonkin incident, according to reliable American sources then working in the Air Force, U.S. aircraft completed surveys of northeast Laos with the principal objective of finding areas close to the North Vietnamese border that could be used to support the American bombing of the Ho Chi Minh Trail and North Vietnam itself.

STARTED IN 1964

Although foreign military intervention in Laos was prohibited by the 1962 Geneva accords, the sources say construction of the Phou Pha Thi installation was begun in late 1964.

The mountain had obvious strategic advantages. It faced a narrow valley where a 700-foot-long dirt landing strip was built.

Its proximity to North Vietnam and its commanding heights made it ideal for radar guidance systems and as a base for "Jolly Green Giant" rescue helicopters, which were used to save American pilots downed by anti-aircraft fire in North Vietnam.

The base, as described by a variety of Americans and Laotians here who visited it, was like something out of an Ian Fleming novel.

Exotic telecommunications equipment, including radar nets, dotted Phou Pha Thi and several nearby hills. American Air Force and CIA personnel used the valley landing strip as the base for American-led teams of Meo mercenaries entering North Vietnam on special harassment missions.

These teams were also used to attack the Pathet Lao administrative headquarters and Samneau town, 23 miles to the east.

REMOTE-CONTROL BOMBING

The radar was used to pinpoint exact distances between Phou Pha Thi and targets in North Vietnam, and guide the planes there. This sophisticated installation was considered essential for bombing in bad weather and at night.

The main American headquarters was in a deep limestone cavern near the mountain's summit.

Inside the cavern were control consoles for the electronic equipment and a situation room. Living quarters were in a nearby concrete bunker.

The entire complex was ringed with Clandestine Army positions, directed by American personnel in cooperation with Meo officers paid by the CIA.

Into the Pha Thi runway, civilian American pilots, employed by Air America, the charter airline that acts as the U.S. logistics arm in Laos, would fly supplies, electronic equipment and arms.

Unmarked, armed helicopters transported Laotian soldiers and U.S. personnel on missions. Short take-off and landing aircraft based at Pha Thi were used to link scores of other "friendly" positions deep in the Communist hinterland.

JUST VISITING

Some of the Americans there would fly into North Vietnam just so they could say they'd been there, one witness said. There was a Philippine cook who made steaks and ham sandwiches, he added.

This American use of Laos to support the bombing of North Vietnam quickly became intolerable to Hanoi. Several attacks at Pha Thi failed in 1965 and 1967.

"The place was impregnable," said one American. "To get up three sides you would have needed to be an Alpine expert. On the fourth was a lot of American hardware and Vang Pao's Meos."

On Jan. 12, 1968, four Soviet-manufactured single-engine biplanes of the North Vietnamese air force attempted to destroy the base. The planes were AN–2s, vintage Soviet aircraft that can carry some 10 passengers at a speed of less than 200 miles an hour. The aircraft are used by Aeroflot for crop dusting, rural transport and passenger service in remote areas of Siberia.

An American civilian, who was at Pha Thi at the time of the only confirmed North Vietnamese air attack in the history of the Laotian war, related:

"JUST WACKY"

"It was just wacky. We saw these four incredibly slow-moving old planes coming out of North Vietnam. It was like something out of the First World War. The Viets were trying to shoot machine guns out of windows. The AN-2 has no bomb bay and they were going to push explosives out of the open door. Everybody saw them coming, so the Air American helicopters took off at once and, being much faster, ran rings around the Viet planes. The Air America guys fired M–16s at the planes right on the border. One of the planes crashed inside Laos.

"Another went down about two kilometers inside North Vietnam. The other two got away. It was like a joke."

The wreckage of one plane was eventually carried to Vientiane, where it was exhibited in front of the That Luang Monument, Vientiane's most important religious shrine, as evidence of North Vietnamese military aggression in Laos.

TAKEN BY COMMUNISTS

Two months later, however, in March 1968, Phou Pha Thi was taken by Communist troops. During the dry season of 1966 and 1967, Laotian troops, with American support, had re-taken large areas of Pathet Lao territory, including Nambac, a valley town 65 miles north of the royal capital of Luang Prabang.

In early 1968, the North Vietnamese retook Nambac and pushed into other government-held areas, such as the Sedone Valley in South Laos, where an American strategic-hamlet program had been started in an attempt to deny the valley's rice harvest to the Pathet Lao who, it was believed, were passing it on to North Vietnamese troops on the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

The 1968 Laos offensive, which corresponded to the Tet offensive in South Vietnam, also saw increased Communist attacks in Samneua Province.

After several North Vietnamese attacks at Phou Pha Thi in February 1968, a Communist assault there finally succeeded. Several guarding positions fell early in March, and some U.S. personnel were evacuated.

On March 10, 1968, the landing strip was lost, cutting Pha Thi's only link with the outside world. North Vietnamese troops then fought their way up the exposed side of the mountain, advancing in some cases in hand-to-hand combat, and attack.

Inside the limestone cave and concrete bunker, again according to American sources familiar with the incident, were between 12 and 21 Americans, mostly U.S. Air Force personnel, a number of Laotian officers and some 100 Meo troops.

FOUGHT TO LAST MAN

"They fought to the last man," said one American. "They were all killed on March 11, inside that grotto. An enormous amount of electronics equipment was lost, too."

The U.S. government never has acknowledged officially the deaths of these Americans, nor the fact that Laotian territory within a few miles of North Vietnam was used to support the U.S. bombing of North Vietnam.

The incident, however, has been common knowledge among long-time residents of Vientiane for two years. It was never fully reported before in the press and was fading from memory when President Nixon's statement raised the question of American ground combat deaths in Laos.

The number of Americans killed at Phou Pha Thi is not exactly known. Pathet Lao broadcast in March 1968 claimed the total as 21.

The Pathet Lao representative in Vientiane, Col. Soth Pretasi, said in an interview this week that the number was 19. Several American and Laotian sources also have given the number killed as 19.

"SUBSTANTIALLY CORRECT"

An American official, while refusing to confirm or deny the account of the fall of Pha Thi as reconstructed here, has said the Pathet Lao account "appears to be substantially correct."

Other well-informed sources have said the total of Americans killed at Pha Thi was "13 or a little less."

The above version of the incident was corroborated in cross-interviews with American, Laotian, European, and Pathet Lao sources.

In an interview yesterday, an authoritative North Vietnamese diplomat said, "If Laos is to be neutralized and have peace again, it must be in such a way that its neighbors will not be threatened and be able to coexist peacefully with Laos."

Other Communist sources have indicated that North Vietnam, as the part of any overall Laos settlement, regards guarantees that Laotian territory will never again be used to attack North Vietnam, the sine qua non of permanent peace.

The U.S. government and the government of Prince Souvanna Phouma see things differently. They point out that the Ho Chi Minh Trail has been used by North Vietnam to attack South Vietnam since the early sixties, that an estimated 50,000 North Vietnamese troops are in Laos, and that the North Vietnamese recently attacked the Plain of Jars.

"SERVED ITS PURPOSE"

"There's no use being a bleeding heart about Phou Pha Thi," said one of the Americans who provided some of the above details. "The North Vietnamese have used Laos. So have we. Phou Pha Thi served its purpose, and Hanoi will have no right to complain until it begins to practice what it preaches."

Although Laotian government troops briefly reoccupied Phou Pha Thi in December 1968, the mountain never again has been used to support the U.S. war effort in Vietnam.

Nineteen days after the outpost fell, President Johnson announced the halt of bombing of North Vietnam north of the 19th Parallel.

REDS CAPTURE LAOS OUTPOSTS OF GUERRILLAS

(By Tammy Arbuckle)

VIENTIANE.—North Vietnamese forces launched new thrusts in northern Laos today directed at the outer defenses of U.S. and Meo guerrilla bases in Sam Thong and Long Chien, 100 miles north of Vientiane.

(Wire service reports indicated that some Americans—perhaps a dozen—were being evacuated from Sam Thong.)

Meo guerrillas in the hills around Tha Tam Bleung, 5 miles northeast of Sam Thong, woke up this morning to find North Vietnamese troops occupying Tha Tam airstrip.

The Communist forces took Phou Pa Xai outpost a few miles east of Sam Thong after a brief fight at 4 a.m., the Lao military said.

A Communist commando squad threw satchel charges at a U.S. generator outpost 5 miles southeast of Long Chien.

Reliable military sources said seven battalions of Hanoi's 316th Division were involved in the advance on Sam Thong. This means between 2,000 and 3,000 troops.

Air America today evacuated more than 200 government wounded from Sam Thong hospital as a precaution in the event the base falls. Fifty-six of these were seriously wounded troops from this morning's fighting which was described by the military as "spotty."

In Washington, the State Department said the American Embassy had reported that the "Military situation is serious" at both Sam Thong and Long Chien.

The Communist thrust against the U.S.-guerrilla bases represents a new Communist move in the Laos war.

Previous Communists attacks have been confined to retaking areas held by the Communists when the 1962 Geneva Accords were signed. The Sam Thong-Long Chien thrust means that the Communists are attacking areas held by the government in 1962.

Meo refugees today were reported to be walking into Sam Thong from fallen outposts.

There have been approximately 70 Americans in the Sam Thong-Long Chien area, including one woman.

The figure includes eight workers, for the U.S. Agency for International Development, 12 Air America employees at Sam Thong and between 40 and 50 others—CIA and military advisers, interrogators and Air Force men.

The Americans are armed with M16 rifles and captured Communist AK47 submachine-guns.

Long Chien houses sophisticated American communications equipment.

The North Vietnamese military aim—if the present thrust continues—would be to smash the U.S.-supported Meo guerrillas headed by Gen. Vang Pao. With American backing, Vang Pao has held off the North Vietnamese for eight years with the loss of at least 15,000 men on each side.

Informed sources said the thrust is timed to coincide with the Communist call for political talks with Premier Souvanna Phouma's government.

"It's part of the Communists' old talk-fight policy," sources said, explaining that the destruction of Vang Pao would so seriously weaken the forces of neutralist Souvanna Phouma that he would be forced to make concessions to the Reds at the bargaining table.

The Pathet Lao have offered a five-point peace plan but have not yet sent an emissary to Vientiane with the proposal.

The Pathet Lao radio said today, however, that the emissary has left "the liberated zone" but gave no destination for him.

If the North Vietnamese take Long Thien, they will be within 20 miles of an American-built road leading to Vientiane, the administrative capital.

Also, the troops of Gen. Kouprasith Abhay at Sala Phou Khoun, 150 miles north of here, will be cut off by road from Military Region 5 including the capital defense for which the general is responsible.

THAI TROOPS SAID TO HELP DEFEND LAOS—BUT ZIEGLER INDICATES INVOLVEMENT AT BASE IS "VERY LIMITED"

VIENTIANE, LAOS, March 20.—Two Thai battalions have been flown to Long Cheng in U.S. civil aircraft to help defend that Army base from an expected North Vietnamese onslaught, well-informed sources said today.

In Washington, Ronald L. Ziegler, White House press secretary, confirmed some Thai involvement, but said the report that two battalions were involved was "grossly exaggerated."

Mr. Ziegler first said he would not comment on the report, but added: "I will say that the report is grossly exaggerated. I am not going to comment on the very limited Thai involvement in Laos." He said he would leave that to the governments of Laos and Thailand.

Long Cheng, 90 miles north of Vientiane, appeared in peril after the North Vietnamese seized three hill top positions and advanced to within a mile of the base, the informants reported.

This report came just about the time a pro-Communist Pathet Lao emissary arrived in Vientiane from Hanoi bringing a peace plan for Prince Souvanna Phouma, the Premier. The Pathet Lao emissary, Col. Pradith Thiengtham, is expected to see the Premier tomorrow.

FIVE-POINT PEACE PLAN

The Pathet Lao recently unveiled a five-point peace plan and announced that Colonel Pradith, an aide to Prince Souphanouvong, nominal head of the Pathet Lao, would carry details to Vientiane.

The plan calls for an end to all U.S. bombing in Laos, including the Ho Chi Minh supply trail used by the North Vietnamese in eastern Laos, a cease-fire, a consultative conference of all political parties, creation of a demilitarized zone for the conference, and a provisional coalition government.

The informants, in a position to know, said the Thai battalions were flown from Thailand bases in planes of Air America, which is chartered by the U.S. Aid agency in Laos. (The airline is also believed to have close ties to the Central Intelligence Agency.)

A Thai battalion normally has a peak strength of 500 men. This was the first report of any sizable Thai force entering the conflict in Laos. There have been numerous reports, however, of small groups of Thai advisers working with the Laotian forces.

The sources said anti-Communist demonstrations in neighboring Cambodia, topped by the coup Wednesday that deposed Prince Norodom Sihanouk as chief of state, encouraged the royal Laotian government to stiffen its stand against the Pathet Lao and their North Vietnamese allies.

The sources did not know precisely how the Thais fitted into this situation, although they noted that Thailand has recognized a potential threat to its borders in the North Vietnamese drive through Laos.

The sources explained that Lao officials initially had ordered their forces to pull back from Sam Thong, a key supply base 10 miles northwest of Long Cheng, in the face of the North Vietnamese advance. The officials had been considering abandoning Long Cheng as well until the Cambodian events occurred.

In addition to the two Thai battalions, hundreds of other reinforcements have been sent into the Long Cheng-Sam Thong region. These include regular Laotian Army troops and American-trained Laotian special forces troops.

The advance on Long Cheng was reported to be by company strength units although the North Vietnamese are believed to have about 4,000 troops in that area.

Laotian Air Force T-28 bombers made 15 raids a mile from the eastern end of the Long Cheng airfield after a North Vietnamese force was detected there moving toward the headquarters of Gen. Vang Pao.

Col. Thongphanh Knoksy, the Defense Ministry spokesman, denied that the North Vietnamese actually had captured Sam Thong Wednesday, as reported by well informed sources. In any event, the U.S.-maintained supply base was abandoned by officials. A pilot flying over the town yesterday reported it appeared deserted.

THAIS LONG INVOLVED IN LAOTIAN FIGHTING

(By Jack Foisie)

BANGKOK.—Thai military involvement in Laos may be "very limited," as presidential press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler cautiously allowed Friday, but it is not new.

Under American auspices, two Thai artillery battalions were used in Laos last year during the defense of the northern road junction town of Muong Soui.

Thai pilots have flown T-28 bomber planes, although now the pilots may be almost entirely Laotian.

Thai observers fly in spotter planes to direct artillery fire and bomber strikes on the enemy. They are valuable because of their ability to speak Lao (which is similar to the Thai language) and English.

There are Thai "liaison officers" in every Lao military region. Their function is obscure but likely to be connected with the allied trail watching teams that range deep into the area of enemy infiltration routes through Laos into the South Vietnam war arena.

For this highly paid and dangerous assignment, Asians are used because the presence of white faces would quickly be transmitted to the enemy. Besides Thais, trail watchers include Nung tribesmen from South Vietnam, Filipinos and Chinese. Laotians generally do not serve because of the danger of including enemy agents.

There are estimates that as many as 5,000 Thais may be involved, in some role, in the Laotian war; but most long-time observers think the number is lower, and that the level fluctuates greatly.

In a sense, the United States counts on the Thais as a strategic ground force reserve in Laos. When the war heats up, Thais are flown in.

Almost without exception the Thais arrive in American aircraft, are armed and trained by Americans, and are paid—indirectly—by Americans at scales much greater than regular Thai army pay.

What may be new about Saturday's fly-in of a new Thai contingent to Long Tieng is that it indicates a tipping of the scales within Thai top-level policy bodies for larger and possibly more open involvement in the Laotian war.

Thailand has a growing insurgency in its northern regions adjacent to Laos and there is ample evidence that insurgents are moving into Thailand from Lao bases.

CIA AIDING LONG CHENG DEFENDERS—100 AGENTS SAID TO BE INSTRUCTING MEOS FOR LAOTIAN OPERATION

VIENTIANE, LAOS, March 22.—The American Central Intelligence Agency, the United States Army and neighboring Thailand are directly involved in the defense of the threatened Laotian base at Long Cheng, informed sources said tonight.

They said as many as 100 CIA agents, working under the cover of the U.S. Embassy and the U.S. Agency for International Development, are taking part in the secret operation, training Meo tribesmen as guerrillas in both Laos and Thailand.

It is known that U.S. Army officers directed a massive airlift of both Laotian and Thai reinforcements into Long Cheng, which is the headquarters of Gen. Vang Pao's American-trained army of Meo guerrillas and is under heavy North Vietnamese pressure. It is located 80 miles north of the capital, just below the Plain of Jars, now held by the North Vietnamese.

"SOME VOLUNTEERS"

In Bangkok the Thai premier, Field Marshal Thanom Kittikachorn, denied today that two Thai army battalions were sent to reinforce Long Cheng but admitted that "some volunteers" may have gone there.

Estimates in Bangkok of the number of volunteers, reportedly being trained by U.S. Special Forces teams, range from 300 to 12,000. The figure mentioned most often is 5,000.

Sources in Vientiane said as many as 400 Thai troops, including an artillery detachment, were flown into Long Cheng, mostly from bases in Thailand.

They added that the United States has been prodding the Thai government to give Laos more support, both economically and militarily.

AERIAL OBSERVERS

Americans listed in official records as Army attaches constantly fly over Long Cheng as aerial observers, gathering intelligence on which to base tactical ground and air operations.

Sources said these Americans never remain at Long Cheng overnight, but commute daily, leaving Vientiane early in the morning and returning by dusk. It is a 45-minute helicopter flight each way.

"We wouldn't want the Communists to capture any Americans or find any American dead on the battlefield," one source explained. Most enemy attacks on Long Cheng are launched under the cover of darkness.

North Vietnamese hit the base with rocket fire today for the third successive day. About a dozen rockets exploded in the predawn darkness, sources said, but first reports indicated no casualt ies or damage.

U.S. PLANE IS DOWNED

The U.S. Command said Sunday in Saigon that a U.S. Air Force OV–10 Bronco was shot down and destroyed yesterday over the Plain of Jars north of Long Cheng, but the pilot was rescued with no reported injuries. The twin-engine armed reconnaissance craft was the eighth U.S. plane lost over Laos since the command began reporting air operations there March 10.

Speaking with newsmen at Bangkok Airport after seeing off Indonesian President Suharto, Mr. Kittikachorn said the reason Thai volunteers were going to Laos was "probably because Laos and Thailand are neighbors and both countries' people have blood relations. The volunteers may be cousins or brothers of Laotians."

Pressed on whether the airlift of Thai troops had taken place, he said: "There may be some truth in it." But he added: "As I said, these men may be volunteers."

He also said some Laotian soldiers have "received training in Thailand and returned to Laos to be advisers and instructors in the Laotian army."

Gen. Surakit Mayalarb, the Thai army chief of staff, said no Thai troops had been sent to Laos.

General Surakit was reported to have flown secretly to Laos two weeks ago for talks on the military situation with the Laotian premier, Prince Souvanna Phouma, and his generals.

Vang Pao, the guerrilla general, was in Vientiane today with other top Laotian military commanders to discuss the deteriorating war situation with Mr. Phouma.

SINGLE THAI BATTALION IN LAOS

A Thai artillery battalion is operating in Laos with the support of the United States.

The presence of the Thai artillerymen has been a closely held secret of the governments concerned. Hints of its presence in the battle zone came Friday in wire dispatches from Laos referring to "two Thai battalions" in the area of the beleaguered support base at Long Cheng. Apparently the perhaps 300 artillerymen were confused with a larger force. The confusion may have been abetted by the presence of a Thai general with the artillerymen. Normally, a battalion would be under the command of a lieutenant colonel.

Sources here disclosed, however, that the U.S. has not so far favored the insertion of more Thai forces than the single artillery battalion.

Because of the delicacy of the situation, American funds to support the Thai artillerymen have been provided separately from other, more obvious funding for the war in Laos.

The Thai battalion has been flown in and out of Laos from time to time, most recently a week or so ago.

It was not immediately clear why the original decision was made to use the Thais in Laos with American support. The use of the combat force was, of course, a violation of the Geneva agreements. But the violation of those agreements has been a fairly regular occurrence since the North Vietnamese decided to initiate the campaign against Laos and the Americans reacted.

Sources here say that the artillerymen were more desirable than Thai ground forces for several reasons. First, they are a 155 mm. howitzer battalion, and there were no Meos (hill tribesmen who live along the border) or Royal Lao forces trained in 155 mm. howitzer operation when the decision was considered to bring the Thais in. Second, it was thought that, as artillerymen, they would prove to be less visible during the fighting than would infantrymen confronting the enemy directly. Finally, they could serve as ground forces if absolutely necessary.

When the decision was made to send the Thais in, the Thai Government was interested in demonstrating support for the Royal Lao Government. Laos separates Thailand from North Vietnam and acts as a buffer. The Lao Government, which does not possess an extremely capable army, was eager for the help and the United States was willing.

At this moment, the disclosure of the Thai presence does not seem likely to alter the course of the war. It is apparently not a prelude to anything more. Indeed, according to present plans, the artillerymen are to be withdrawn from the battlezone around midyear to be replaced by Lao forces newly trained in the use of medium artillery.

DIRECTED BY THE UNITED STATES.—"SECRET ARMY" ACTIVE AROUND SOUTH ASIA

(By Tammy Arbuckle)

VIENTIANE.—The Thai troops who have joined the fighting in Laos are part of an American-directed "secret army" which operates all through Southeast Asia.

Making up its units are Cambodians, Vietnamese, Chinese and Laotians, as well as Thais and various hill tribes, such as the Meos who have been active on the Plain of Jars.

Its operations extend into northeast Burma, China's Yunnan Province, North Vietnam, South Vietnam, Cambodia and Thailand—all part of the guerrilla war fought by both Communist and anti-Communist forces for many years in this part of the world.

For example, Haw tribal agents working for the Central Intelligence Agency cross into South China from Laos and Black Thai tribesmen cross into North Vietnam from Laos.

These tribes live on both sides of the borders, the Haw in northern Laos and Yunnan, the Black Thai in Laos' Sam Neua Province and North Vietnam's Dien Bien Phu Province, making their detection difficult.

The pro-American guerrillas have killed Communist leaders, destroyed key links in Communist communications and logistics and, tied down large numbers of Communist soldiers in defensive actions.

In Laos the secret army has wiped out Communist headquarters and taken over prison camps and rescued inmates.

On one occasion in South Laos, a guerrilla group in one night operation wiped out a prison camp controlled by Pathet Lao guards and rescued 59 prisoners, crossing back into Thailand before the Communists could strike back.

The Thai force at Long Chien, which helped yesterday to clear a ridge overlooking the base, may be listed as the secret army's latest success.

About 1,000 Thais were reported yesterday to have joined Gen. Vang Pao's army of Meo tribesmen at Long Chien. Reports from the area today said a North Vietnamese attack was beaten back and some positions previously lost to the Communists had been retaken.

Thais have long operated in Laos. In February 1967, reporters saw Thai commandoes at Nam Bac, a Lao government base 60 miles north of the royal capital of Luang Prabang, not far from the Hanoi-Peking borders.

The Thais stood out like a sore thumb for they spoke in a Bangkok dialect.

When questioned closely they admitted they were from the Thai military.

The secret army operations in Southeast Asia are directed by small groups of efficient Americans working out of offices under cover of organizations in various cities in the region.

Laos, bordering on all the Southeast Asia nations, is ideal for these U.S. operations. And the secret army concept fits neatly into the Guam doctrine.

Americans take care of the leadership, training, planning and logistics. The Asians do the bulk of the fighting.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

BYELORUSSIAN AMERICANS MARK 52D ANNIVERSARY OF INDEPENDENCE

HON. GLENN CUNNINGHAM

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, American citizens of Byelorussian origin today mark the 52d anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. In Byelorussia, however, a national celebration has been replaced by observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Vladimir Ulianoff, the man we know as Nikolai Lenin.

The United Nations' Commission on Human Rights also has adopted a resolution to commemorate the birth of this man on April 20 of this year.

Might I say, Mr. Speaker, this commemoration is a most cynical humiliation of the idea of humanism. It is a public mockery of human rights as defined by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as adopted by the United Nations.

This resolution demonstrates a flagrant injustice by the free world toward not only the Byelorussian nation, but all others who were conquered and suffered oppression under Lenin's rule.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is most inappropriate for those of us who believe in freedom and justice for all to honor a man such as Nikolai Lenin.

I include the following letter at this point:

BYELORUSSIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA,
Queens, N.Y., March 9, 1970.

Hon. GLENN CUNNINGHAM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: March 25, 1970 will mark an anniversary of great significance for American citizens of Byelorussian origin, for on that day Byelorussians everywhere in the countries of the free world will celebrate the 52nd anniversary of the proclamation of independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. In Byelorussia, however, a national celebration of independence is replaced by the observance of 100th anniversary of the birth of Vladimir Ulianoff (Lenin), former leader of the Russian Bolshevik Party and former head of Soviet Russian Government, glorified as the alleged benefactor of the Byelorussian people.

The United Nations' Commission on Human Rights on March 13, 1969 has adopted a resolution to commemorate the 100th year since the birth of Vladimir Ulianoff (Lenin), former leader of the Russian Bolshevik Party and former head of Soviet Russian Government, as a great humanitarian. This celebration will take place on April 20, 1970.

Byelorussian people is enslaved by Soviet Russia today and is unable to express freely its past and present experiences under communism and its opinion on the humanitarianism of Lenin. Therefore, we would like to present an opinion on the humanitarianism of Lenin with respect to the Byelorussian people and its country.

As a theorist of Russian Bolshevism, Lenin appeared as a decisive defender of the integrity of the Russian Empire, many years before usurping power in Russia. In his program, for the Russian Social-Democratic Workers' Party (Bolsheviks), Lenin acknowledged the right of non-Russian nations for self-determination down to separation, but not real separation. Lenin was against separation of non-Russian nations from Russia. His position was for holding them inside the borders of the Russian state and to convince his own party members to take the same attitude (Letter, by Lenin, from Krakau to S. Shaumian, November 23, 1913).

After usurpation of power in Russia on November 7, 1917 Lenin showed utmost hostility toward the liberation of all non-Russian nations, dominated by the Russian Empire. The Declaration of Rights for nations of Russia, accepted by the Bolshevik Government, was a repetition of the national policy as it was formulated previously in the program of the Bolshevik Party by Lenin.

The treatment of Byelorussia, headed by the Lenin government was—as follows. The First All-Byelorussian Congress consisting of 1,872 representatives convened in Miensk on December 15, 1917. This was a national Byelorussian assembly, whose aim was to decide the future statehood of Byelorussia. Bolshevik-Russian delegates were in a small minority. They were not able to influence the Congressional decisions. The Congress has chosen independence for the Byelorussian state. On December 17, 1917 the Red Russian Army dispersed the Congress by order of the Soviet Russian Government.

During the continuing war, at a favorable situation, the Council of the First All-Byelorussian Congress proclaimed independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic on March 25, 1918. In opposition to this independent Byelorussian state Lenin ordered the creation of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic (BSSR). This fictitious state, as well as its government, were created by the Soviet Government in Moscow. Proclamation of the BSSR took place on January 1, 1919 in the city of Smalensk which was conquered by Russia.

Later, the Soviet Russian Army conquered most of Byelorussia. Concluding peace treaty with Poland in Riga in 1921, Lenin without representatives from the BSSR divided the territory of Byelorussia as follows: The BSSR was alloted a territory of six counties of the Miensk district only, with a population of approximately 1.2 million. Poland was given approximately 100,000 sq. km. of Byelorussia with a population of approximately 4 millions. Directly to Russian SFSR there was annexed approximately 250,000 sq. km. of Byelorussian territory with a population of over 9 millions. This partition of Byelorussia and subjugation of her people existed until the death of Lenin. In this way Lenin brutally suppresed the aims of the Byelorussian people for self-determination and independence, and turned into a colonial people of Soviet Russia.

By introduction of his own totalitarian communist regime in Byelorussia, Lenin deprived Byelorussian people of all its human rights and freedoms, the rights recognized by the Western World at this time, and proclaimed earlier by the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. Those rights being: freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of press, freedom of association, freedom of worship, freedom of economical activity, freedom to elect one's own government, freedom to choose one's habitat and travel abroad, immunity of home, independence of judiciary, etc. Freedom of activity was given to the Bolshevik Party only, which was executing orders from the central government in Moscow. The leadership of this party in Byelorussia was composed of non-Byelorussians. It was a reliable instrument for domination over the Byelorussian nation.

The constitution of the BSSR, as well as the USSR, guaranteed in writing most of the above mentioned freedoms. However, these constitutions exist on paper only to mislead the foreign opinion. In reality the Bolshevik Party is using such policies which are suiting her aims, ignoring completely existing constitutions.

Lenin introduced a very brutal tyranny by governing Bolshevik Party superiors. Called by him, hypocritically, "workers' and peasants' government," as well as a Central Committee of Bolshevik Party, included neither a single worker, nor a peasant. The Communist Party occupied a privileged place, that which was previously held by nobility in czarist era.

The Bolshevik Party represented a new ruling class of fascist type. It used a limitless and merciless exploitation of working people. Starvation and hunger, shortage of all necessary articles existed in reality during Lenin's rule. Only the members of the Communist Party were supplied through special exclusive distribution stores, unaccessible to the rest of the population.

This oppression of people was possible only by the use of mass and ruthless terror. In this field Lenin showed extraordinary ability. He organized Cheka (Extraordinary Committee—Secret Police) headed by the notorious F. Derzhynsky. This mill of death had no other predecessor in modern history. The infamous czarist security service (okhranka) in comparison with Cheka was a very liberal institution. The surveillance by police was raised to systematic denunciation of each person. The Cheka kept an accumulative file on all. A new crime was discovered in which each person became a suspect—the potential enemy of the Soviet Government. The arrests of innocent people in mass as those potential enemies; the relentless savage abuse and torture of imprisoned people, who were admitting the non-committed crimes; the shooting of people en mass without trial—all this, as a sword of Damocles, was hanging over a defenseless people, murdered by Lenin's bureaucrats, immune to any responsibility.

Lenin is the father of Russian Bolshevism, that which is oppressing Byelorussian people for over 50 years. This period is the most severe and tragic of all Byelorussian history. During this time the Bolshevik Moscow annihilated over 6 million of Byelorussians. But, at the present time, using systematic Russianization, deportations of Byelorussians to Siberia, and colonization of Byelorussia by Russians, the Moscow Government is attempting a complete removal from the globe of the separate Byelorussian nation and transforming it into a part of Russia. This genoside is a direct result of the Leninist national policies applied towards non-Russian nations of the USSR.

Miss Svetlana Alliluyeva, daughter of J. Stalin, recently made this public statement, ". . . all of this did not begin with my father. So many people think that he invented the system, the dictatorship, the police, the spying. But he didn't. He inherited it all from Lenin."

Lenin projected conquest of the entire globe by Bolshevism. He designed a universal USSR, of course, under the hegemony of Soviet Russia. This design is used by the present government of Moscow as a current program of realization. Soviet Russia is giving top priority to the development of her own military power, and is gradually realizing the testament of Lenin on the conquest and enslavement of the remaining independent countries. This subjugation of nations of central Europe after the 2nd World War, communist expansion in Greece, Korea and Vietnam, the recent military invasion into Czechoslovakia, all these are the concurrent steps leading towards the realization of the expansionist plan designed by Lenin.

We are assuming, that proposal to commemorate the birthday of Lenin in the United Nations was initiated by the representatives from Soviet Russia, or by their subservient countries-satellites. The real aim behind this diversionist maneuver is to disorient nations of the free world, and to make them more vulnerable to gradual absorption by Moscow.

We would like to call your kind attention to the fact that this commemoration would be a most cynical humiliation of the idea of humanism. It would be a public mockery of human rights as defined by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations. It will demonstrate a flagrant injustice expressed by the free countries towards the Byelorussian nation, which was conquered, oppressed and suffered heavily under Lenin's terrorist rule, as well as under the rule, inspired by him, of the present Government of Soviet Russia. We would like to ask you for decisive rejection of this celebration as completely inappropriate for people honoring freedom and justice for all.

At this time, the Byelorussians living in their native country do not have any opportunity to defend their national interests. Therefore, we take liberty to ask you for support of the desires of the Byelorussian people for liberation from Soviet Russian slavery, and for restoration of an independent Byelorussian state.

Very respectfully yours,

JOHN KOSIAK,
President.

FARM PAYMENTS OVER $25,000

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, during the past 2 years I have placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the names of the farmers in the Nation which in 1967 and 1968 received huge sums of money from the U.S. Treasury in the form of farm program payments.

Each year, too, I have introduced amendments which would place a limit on the amount of payments any one farmer could receive from the Federal Treasury. The idea of limiting to a reasonable amount the maximum amount of funds going to a farmer has grown in popularity both among the Members of Congress and the Nation's citizens. This acceptance on the part of the citizenry stretches the length and breadth of the Nation and comes from the rural as well as the urban sectors.

Limitation of farm payments is an idea which is commonly accepted and so that each Member of the Congress can make a side-by-side comparison with the information placed in the RECORD the past 2 years, I am placing in the RECORD today the names of the Nation's farmers who in 1969 received $25,000 in Federal farm program payments—excluding wool and sugar—listing them by State and county.

I announced in Tuesday's RECORD that I again plan to introduce an amendment to place a limitation on Federal farm payments in the range of $20,000. The list of names as I have them assembled will assist every Member of Congress in determining which farmers in their State or district will be affected by such a limit.

During 1969, a total of 7,795 farmers received payments from the Federal Government in excess of $25,000. This is an increase of 1,881 farmers in this rather exclusive group over the previous year. These farmers divided a total of $93,333,643 more in 1969 than the farmers receiving these huge payments the previous year.

Listed below are some farmers who received exceptionally high payments both years. You will note that in nearly every case, the amount received by these farmers in 1969 was greater than before.

GARY CARLSON—A TRIBUTE

HON. HASTINGS KEITH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the sad duty of attending a memorial service for one of the finest young men it has been my privilege to know, Capt. Gary W. Carlson. I knew Gary as a neighbor in West Bridgewater; I saw him grow up from a youngster to a young man; I appointed him to West Point, and took added pride in his achievement there. And when he died in his country's service, it was my own personal loss as well as the Nation's.

Recently the Distinguished Service Cross, the Purple Heart, and the Bronze Star were presented posthumously to Gary, for "extraordinary heroism" and devotion to duty.

No medals can do anything to add to the luster of this man's memory among those who knew him—or knew of him. But they are a grateful Nation's only means of expressing its profound appreciation for what Gary Carlson was, and what he did. And so I am proud to place in the RECORD a story from the Brockton Enterprise about Capt. Gary Carlson. I trust that his example of courage and patriotism will serve as an example and an inspiration to others.

The article follows:

WEST BRIDGEWATER HERO POSTHUMOUSLY AWARDED NATION'S SECOND HIGHEST MEDAL

WEST POINT, N.Y.—The Distinguished Service Cross, the nation's second highest award for combat heroism, was recently presented posthumously to Capt. Gary W. Carlson of West Bridgewater, in ceremonies held at the U.S. Military Academy.

Accepting the award were his wife, Mrs. Dhana Carlson, daughter, Jennifer, and Mr. and Mrs. Carl Carlson of 491 West St., West Bridgewater.

Also awarded were the Purple Heart and Bronze Star Medals.

Capt. Carlson, a 1967 graduate of the academy, was killed in action in Vietnam in June, 1969. At that time he was a Troop Commander for Troop C, 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry, 25th Infantry Div.

A portion of the citation accompanying the award read: "When the troop came under fire from a well-concealed enemy force, he immediately led his men in an assault on the hostile fortifications. Realizing that the crossfire was impeding the movement of his troop, he single-handedly assaulted and destroyed the most strategic hostile position. He then directed his fire against another enemy position, silencing it with hand grenades and rifle fire. Spotting a wounded comrade lying exposed to the enemy barrage, Capt. Carlson braved the fusillade to move the man to safety. He then returned to the center of conflict to evacuate another casualty.

"As he returned to his vehicle, he was knocked to the ground by a rocket-propelled grenade which rendered his command vehicle inoperative. Braving a hail of fire to reach another vehicle, he resumed control of his troop. It was while he was directing this assault on the enemy that he was mortally wounded by enemy fire. Capt. Carlson's extraordinary heroism and devotion to duty, at the cost of his life, were in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service and reflect great credit upon himself, his unit, and the United States Army."

While attending the Academy, Capt. Carlson was active in the Baptist Student Union, Pistol Club and Goat Football Team.

Carlson graduated from West Bridgewater High School in 1963. Following graduation he was appointed to West Point and graduated from the academy on June 7, 1967.

Gary was a member of the Trinity Baptist Church. He was a member of the Christian Youth Fellowship. Gary married the former Dhana Lee Kent on July 1, 1967, in the Holy Trinity Chapel at West Point. He became a father on April 8, 1969 when his daughter, Jennifer, was born.

Following his graduation from West Point Carlson was stationed at Fort Knox, Ky., and Fort Benning, Ga. In November of 1968 he was sent to Vietnam. On Sept. 14, 1969, he was honored by his townspeople at a flagpole memorial with Cong. Hastings Keith presiding.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, today, March 25, several million people of Byelorussian national origin will be free to celebrate the 52d anniversary of the proclamation of independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic.

The Republic established freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of association, freedom of assembly, freedom of worship, freedom of economic activity, freedom of election, freedom to hold property, freedom of travel, and an independent judiciary system to continue these freedoms.

On January 1, 1919, one massive crunch of oppression mashed these freedoms and replaced a system of justice with an organization called Cheka.

Cheka's surveillance was more intense than the Russian secret police. Operating under a law that defined a new crime—potential enemy of the Soviet Government—Cheka arrested, imprisoned, tortured and murdered en masse.

The father of Cheka, Vladimir Ulyanoff—Lenin—called for the takeover of Byelorussia after which he organized the lethal police organization. On March 25, instead of celebrating independence, Byelorussians on home soil are compelled to honor officially this man who assassinated their parents.

This perversion of patriotism reminds us that the U.S.S.R. does not maintain a benign political posture. This enforced homage reminds us to hope for the liberation of Byelorussians so they may live again under the humane provisions they asked for five decades ago.

TO PROTECT AMERICANS FROM UNWANTED JUNK MAIL

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak today about intrusion—intrusion into the privacy of my life and my childrens' life and your life—intrusion into all of our lives at one time or another.

Each of us is harassed, often dozens of times in a year, by many forms of intrusion into our homes and offices—salesmen; telephone solicitors, and interviewers. But one of the most insidious, and often offensive, sources of intrusion into our lives is unsolicited commercial advertising—junk mail.

Junk mail may seem like a petty aggravation to most recipients. We look at it; we may read it or take out the coupons; then we throw it way. But such a daily aggravation, taken over a year and across a wide continent of mail-receivers turns out to be not so petty an intrusion into our lives after all.

Ask your mailman. During 1969, mailmen carried over a million tons of junk mail on their backs.

Or look in your own mailbox. In 1969, over 19.6 billion pieces of third-class mail—most of it commercial advertising—were delivered to American homes and businesses. That is nearly 100 pieces of junk mail for every man, woman, and child in the United States. That is intrusion.

And it is not cheap. According to the cost ascertainment report of 1968, the Post Office Department that year lost $400,792,000 on the delivery of third-class mail—the mail that few of us want and most of us ignore.

I am introducing today a bill which would help curb this incredible flow of commercial junk mail and in so doing protect postal patrons from at least one form of annoying intrusion into their lives.

The first provision of this bill allows any postal patron to stop any specific commercial advertiser whose message he does not care to receive from continuing to mail to him. By filing a notice at the post office, the patron instructs the Postmaster General that he does not wish to receive any further mailings from a given organization organized for profit which offers for sale goods, matter, or services whose communications he may have found in any way annoying or unacceptable to himself or to him on behalf of his minor children. Upon this instruction, the Postmaster General is authorized to expressly direct the named sender of such communications to strike the patron's address from his mailing list and further, if the patron has so requested, to prohibit that sender from exchanging or selling that patron's name to any other mailer.

A second provision is even broader. By setting up a public register which mailers must consult before sending out any commercial advertising, it allows the postal patron to not only request his name be removed from the mailing list of a single advertiser, but if he wishes, from the mailing lists of all commercial advertisers.

The third provision of the bill I am introducing today establishes yet another form of protection against intrusion of junk mailers into the privacy of a postal patron's life—protection from having his name and address, individually or as part of a mailing list, sold for profit unless he has specifically authorized such a sale.

I think these provisions offer a definite protection for mail receivers who find themselves harassed by an onslaught of unwanted commercial mail. But the implications of the bill for particular types of unwanted mail go beyond that.

You will notice that no arbitrary qualifications have been placed on the postal patron or on his personal criteria of a given mailing's unacceptableness. By avoiding, for example, an age restriction, and any definition of or restriction to obscenity which is at best of questionable constitutionality, this bill may at last provide a truly workable law against obscene commercial mailings—to minors or adults—something which we have been seeking for many years.

This bill does not require a postal patron to justify his unwillingness to receive unsolicited commercial mail from a given source, or any source, merely to state it. It provides in law what is already being done in fact under the provisions of the 1967 Antipandering Act, where postal patrons may, by declaring they find a given mailer's communications erotically arousing or sexually provocative, instruct the Postmaster General to have their names removed from that sender's mailing list. Under the provisions of this bill, no such categorical declaration is necessary, only the decision of the postal patron that he no longer wants to receive a given type of mail—for any reason.

This bill is not designed to threaten the operations of nonprofit organizations who often depend on the privilege of sending unsolicited mail to postal patrons. Indeed, it expressly protects them. Nor should it threaten commercial operations whose communications recipients are unlikely to find unacceptable.

I urge my colleagues to consider the implications of this bill carefully. The important question of obscenity aside, because it is only a secondary target of this bill, I think this bill reestablishes a postal patron's right to the privacy of his own mailbox—to receive the nature of mail he wishes to receive, and to refuse to accept that mail which, for whatever reason he finds it objectionable, he does not wish to receive.

I am including the text of bill described above:

A bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to establish a procedure by which postal patrons may be relieved of the burden of receiving commercial advertisements transmitted in the mails, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4009 of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 4009. Procedure for refusal by postal patrons of receipt of commercial advertisements transmitted by mail

"(a) Whoever for himself, or by his agents or assigns, mails or causes to be mailed any advertisement of an organization organized for profit which offers for sale goods, matter, or services shall be subject to an order of the Postmaster General to refrain from further mailings of such materials to designated addressees thereof if those addressees do not wish to receive such advertisements.

"(b) Upon receipt of notice from an addressee that he has received such mail matter, determined by the addressee in his sole discretion to be of the character described in subsection (a) of this section, the Postmaster General shall issue an order, if requested by the addressee, to the sender thereof, directing the sender and his agents or assign to refrain from further mailings to the named addressees.

"(c) The order of the Postmaster General shall expressly prohibit the sender and his agents or assigns from making any further mailings to the designated addressees, effective on the thirteenth calendar day after receipt of the order. The order of the Postmaster General shall also direct the sender and his agents or assigns to delete immediately the names of the designated addressees from all mailing lists owned or controlled by the sender or his agents or assigns and, further, shall prohibit the sender and his agents or assigns from the sale, rental, exchange, or other transaction involving mail lists bearing the names of the designated addressees.

"(d) Whenever the Postmaster General believes that the sender or anyone acting on his behalf has violated or is violating the order given under this section, he shall serve upon the sender, by registered or certified mail, a complaint stating the reasons for his belief and request that any response thereto be filed in writing with the Postmaster General within fifteen days after the date of such service. If the Postmaster General, after appropriate hearing if requested by the sender, and without a hearing if such a hearing is not requested, thereafter determines that the order given has been or is being violated, he is authorized to request the Attorney General to make application, and the Attorney General is authorized to make application, to a district court of the United States for an order directing compliance with such notice.

"(e) Any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which any mail matter shall have been sent or received in violation of the order provided for by this section shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General, to issue an order commanding compliance with such notice. Failure to observe such order may be punished by the court as contempt thereof.

"(f) Receipt of mail matter thirty days or more after the effective date of the order provided for by this section shall create a rebuttable presumption that such mail was sent after such effective date.

"(g) Upon request of any addressee, the order of the Postmaster General shall include the names of any of his minor children who have not attained their nineteenth birthday, and who reside with the addressee.

"(h) The provisions of subchapter II of chapter 5 (relating to administrative procedure) and chapter 7 (relating to judicial review) of part I of title 5, United States Code, shall not apply to any provisions of this section.

"(i) For the purpose of this section—

"(1) mail matter, directed to a specific address covered in the order of the Postmaster General, without designation of a specific addressee thereon, shall be considered as addressed to the person named in the Postmaster General's order; and

"(2) the term 'children' includes natural children, stepchildren, adopted children, and children who are wards of or in custody of the addressee or who are living with such addressee in a regular parent-child relationship.".

(b) The table of contents of chapter 51 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof—

"4009. Procedure for refusal by postal patrons of receipt of commercial advertisements transmitted by mail.".

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 51 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately after section 4009 thereof the following new section:

"§ 4009a. Procedure for advance notification by postal patron of desire not to receive commercial advertising through the mails

"(a) Whoever for himself, or by his agents or assigns, mails or causes to be mailed any advertisement of an organization organized for profit which offers for sale goods, matter, or services shall, prior to the mailing of such advertisement, submit to the Postmaster General in writing, in such form as the Postmaster General by regulation shall prescribe, a certification with respect to such mailing which states—

"(1) that the mailer has, within the five days immediately preceding the date of mailing, consulted the register provided for by subsection (b) of this section; and

"(2) that none of the advertisements included in the mailing covered by such certification is addressed to any postal patron, whose name appeared on the register as of the date on which the mailer consulted the register, against the wishes of that postal patron as indicated by his registration in accordance with subparagraph (1) or subparagraph (2), as applicable, of subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) The Postmaster General shall establish and keep up to date a register containing the name of any postal patron who has indicated as provided in section 4009—

"(1) that he does not wish to receive commercial advertisements from any particular mailer, and

"(2) that he does not wish to receive commercial advertising through the mails from any source whatsoever, as well as any additional information which the Postmaster General determines to be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. Such register shall be maintained in such form as the Postmaster General considers necessary to carry out the purposes of this section, including a form which will permit (if the Postmaster General considers it necessary) the use of electronic data processing techniques, machinery and equipment. The Postmaster General shall maintain a composite register of all names in Washington, District of Columbia, and, in addition, shall maintain duplicate copies of such register in such other places as he considers necessary to carry out the purposes of this section.

"(c) Whoever for himself, or by his agents or assigns, mails or causes to be mailed any commercial advertisement in violation of the certification submitted to the Postmaster General by the mailer with respect to such mailing, or without submitting such certification, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100, as a civil penalty, for each commercial advertisement so mailed.

"(d) Any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which any commercial advertisement shall have been sent or received in violation of the certification submitted to the Postmaster General with respect to such mailing, or sent or received without such certification having been submitted as required by subsection (a), shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General, to assess the penalty referred to in subsection (c) and, if the court considers it necessary, to issue an injunction to prohibit the further mailing by any commercial mailer for himself, or by his agents or assigns, without complying with the requirements of subsection (a). Failure to comply with the injunction may be punished by the court as contempt thereof.

"(e) The Postmaster General may issue such regulations as may be necessary for the implementation of this section."

(b) The table of sections of chapter 51 of title 59, United States Code, is amended by adding immediately below the item referring to section 4009 the following new item:

"4009a. Procedure for advance notification by postal patron of desire not to receive commercial advertising through the mails.".

SEC. 3. Part IV of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding immediately after chapter 51 thereof the following new chapter;

"CHAPTER 52—SALE AND PURCHASE OF MAILING LISTS BY COMMERCIAL MAILERS

"SEC.

"4021. Sale or purchase of mailing lists prohibited; exception.

"4022. Procedures; proof; defense.

"4023. Civil penalties; injunctions.

"4024. Exclusion; charitable organizations.

"4025. Definitions.

"§ 4021. Sale or purchase of mailing lists prohibited; exception

"(a) No commercial mailer shall sell or purchase, or offer to sell or purchase, any name or list of names intended to be used for mailing any commercial advertisement.

"(b) The fact that a name or list of names is sold to or purchased by any person usually and customarily engaged in the business of commercial mailing is prima facie evidence that the name or list of names was sold to or purchased by such person with intent that it be used for mailing of a commercial advertisement.

"(c) Notwithstanding the prohibition in subsection (a), a commercial mailer may sell or purchase, or offer to sell or purchase, the name of any postal patron who has specifically consented in writing to the sale or purchase of his name for use in the mailing of commercial advertisements.

"§ 4022. Procedure; proof, defense

"(a) A postal patron may file a complaint with the Postmaster General whenever he has reason to believe that the provisions of section 4021 have been violated. The complaint shall specify—

"(1) that the postal patron has received an unsolicited commercial advertisement; and

"(2) the circumstances of the incident and the nature and description of the commercial advertisement received, including the name and address of the commercial mailer mailing the advertisement, if known; and

"(3) the name and address of the person on whose behalf the advertisement was mailed; and

"(4) the reasons that the postal patron believes that his name, or a list containing his name, has been transferred in violation of section 4021.

"(b) Upon receipt of a complaint filed pursuant to subsection (a), the Postmaster General shall initiate an investigation to determine whether a violation of section 4021 has occurred. If the Postmaster General determines that there is reason to believe that a violation of section 4021 has occurred, he shall transmit to the Attorney General for action as provided in this section the evidence pertaining to the alleged violation.

"(c) The Attorney General may institute a civil suit in any district court of the United States which has jurisdiction over the alleged violation for the recovery of civil penalties, or for injunctive relief, as provided in section 4023. Upon a finding, based on a fair preponderance of the evidence, that a commercial mailer has violated the prohibitions contained in section 4021, the district court, sitting without a jury, shall award such relief provided for in section 4023 as it believes is warranted under all the circumstances of the case.

"(d) It is an affirmative defense to an action instituted under this section that the person alleged to have violated the prohibition contained in section 4021 had in his possession, at the time of the act alleged to constitute a violation, a written permission from the postal patron whose name was allegedly transferred in violation of section 4021, which permission authorized the sale or purchase of the postal patron's name for purposes of mailing commercial advertisements.

"§ 4023. Civil penalties; injunctions

"(a) Any person found to have violated the prohibition contained in section 4021 shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $1,000, as a civil penalty, for each name sold or purchased or offered for sale or purchase.

"(b) Any district court of the United States which has jurisdiction over any person found to have violated the prohibitions contained in section 4021 shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General, to assess the penalty referred to in subsection (a), and—

"(1) to issue an injunction to prohibit the use for commercial mailing by any person of the name of any postal patron which was transferred in violation of the prohibition contained in section 4021; and

"(2) to issue an injunction to prohibit the further transfer of any name transferred in violation of section 4021 by any person, and to prohibit the further transfer of the name of any other postal patron in such a manner as to violate section 4021.

Failure to comply with the injunction may be punished by the court as contempt thereof.

"§ 4024. Exclusion of non-profit organizations

"Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to prohibit the sale, purchase, offer to sell or purchase, or other transfer or offer to transfer of any name or list of names to or by any non-profit organization for the purpose of informing the public or any person of the activities of such organization or soliciting financial or other support for such activities.

"§ 4025. Definitions

For purpose of this chapter—

"(1) the term 'person' means any natural person, corporation, partnership, association, organization, or other group;

"(2) the term 'name' means the given name or surname of any person, whether or not accompanied by a street address or city or town of residence, whether printed or written on paper, contained on computer card or tape, or in the form of addressograph plate or other mechanical reproduction or device;

"(3) the term 'commercial advertisement' means any advertisement of an organization organized for profit which offers for sale goods, matter, or services, or any advertisement which offers an opportunity to obtain goods, matter, or services without cost in connection with a later sale of goods, matter, or services, or which offers an opportunity to participate in a lottery, sweepstakes, contest, or game of chance in connection with the sale of goods, matter, or services at some future time;

"(4) the term 'commercial mailer' means any person who usually and customarily mails, or addresses or prepares for mailing, any matter in return for a fee or for profit, or, which offers such services for profit to the public,

"(5) the term 'nonprofit organization' means any charitable, philanthropic, artistic, political, or other organization which is not intended to and does not make a profit.".

SEC. 4. The amendments made by this Act shall become effective on the sixtieth day following the date of enactment of this Act.

TRIPLE STANDARD FOREIGN POLICY

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, in at least three areas of the world established countries are under terrorist attack by guerrilla warfare aimed at the overthrow and destruction of the target nation. In each of these instances the guerrilla troops are Communist indoctrinated, armed with Communist weapons, and pursue Communist aims. Yet, in each of these three areas the U.S. involvement or participation varies so distinctly that it must be said that we observe a triple standard in dealing with Communist aggression.

In South Vietnam the Vietcong and the National Liberation Front are well identified Communist guerrilla forces, armed with Communist weapons, and being exploited against their own people to further Communist aims. The target in South Vietnam is the Republican Government, but it is also American men and the U.S. policy of preventing Communist aggression. Our announced policy is withdrawal, no-win—which is tantamount to enemy victory.

In the Middle East, Israel is under repeated terrorist attack by the Palestinian Arab guerrillas, armed with Communist weapons, and being exploited for the Communist purposes of the Soviet Union and Red China. The apparent policy of our country with regard to Israel is a guaranteed survival, regardless of cost or participation by our Nation.

In Southern Africa, the Republic of Rhodesia and the Portuguese Provinces of Mozambique and Angola have for years been under unceasing terrorist border attack by guerrilla hordes from Tanzania, Zambia, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo bearing Communist weapons and operating pursuant to Communist warfare and ideology. U.S. foreign policy as to this threat from Communist aggression is declared for support the guerrillas and suppression of the right of self-defense by the civilized Christian anti-Communist people under attack.

There may be some kind of logic in distinguishing between good enemies and bad enemies, but it seems that in Africa we alwaye manage to give our support to the savages—the more Communist-controlled the better—against civilized people.

I include an article from the Washington Star in the RECORD at this point:

PEKING ENCOURAGING THE BELLIGERENCE OF PALESTINIAN GUERRILLAS

(By Henry Bradsher)

HONG KONG.—While Secretary of State William P. Rogers was preparing to explain today the U.S. effort to keep the Middle East peaceful, Communist China fanned the bitter embers of a Palestinian war.

"Only through armed struggle is it possible" for the Arabs to recover territory lost to Israel, according to Peking.

As other big nations have skirted the brink of renewed Middle Eastern war with varying degrees of caution, China has uncautiously encouraged those Palestinian refugee organizations to see war as the only way of regaining lost land.

The contrast between Chinese and Soviet policy has been especially sharp. Peking has, however, refrained from the kind of direct attacks on Moscow's Middle Eastern policy that it makes on many other areas of Sino-Soviet policy differences.

Since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war, the Soviet Union has advocated a political solution to the Middle East problem, rather than a military one. Although its arms policy has sometimes thrown doubt on the sincerity of this stand, the Kremlin is assumed by Western observers to want to avoid the dangers of another war.

Its policy has been particularly strained by the refugee guerrilla organizations. Politically unable to denounce them, yet wary of the potential explosiveness of their activities, the Soviets have given them only cautious and limited endorsement.

The Chinese have felt no such need for caution.

Without any responsibilities or economic interests in the Middle East, without client states that might try to drag it into another war, without compunctions about seeing a distant part of the world aflame, China has encouraged the guerrillas.

Peking is now entertaining the leader of Al Fatah, the main refugee guerrilla movement, Yasser Arafat.

When he arrived in Peking Saturday, a full-scale official welcome was given Arafat. It was headed by Deputy Premier Li Hsien-nien, who is China's acting foreign minister.

At a banquet for Arafat, Li said the Palestinian people and peoples of Arab countries "understand ever better that perseverance in the people's armed struggle is the correct road for them."

Arafat expressed "love and respect" for Chairman Mao Tse-tung. "It is no secret if I say that Al Fatah, initiator of the Palestine revolution, received aid first from Peking," Arafat said, according to New China news agency.

Apparently referring to combined U.S.-Soviet-French efforts to arrange a peaceful Middle East settlement, Arafat said: "Our people are facing a monstrous intrigue aimed at undermining our revolution and stopping its advance from behind our backs."

The same day, New China News Agency distributed an Al Fatah statement from Algiers saying the Palestinian people reject any "political solution." Today Radio Peking quoted Al Fatah from Algiers as rejecting a U.N. peace plan for the Middle East.

Radio Peking also repeated in every newscast that Arafat and Li had had a "sincere and friendly" meeting yesterday.

The nature of Chinese aid to Al Fatah was not spelled out in connection with Arafat's visit.

It has been reliably reported in the past, however, that China has provided some weapons and training for Palestinian guerrillas.

The Chinese attitude has produced cool relations with some cautious Arab governments, but has been greatly appreciated by fiercely militant Syria.

Syria was the one Arab nation directly involved in the 1967 war which, although heavily dependent upon Soviet aid, refused to accept the Soviet "political solution" line.

When the Soviet Union became increasingly reluctant to arm Syria, for fear it would itself or through guerrilla fronts spark off another war, the Syrians turned to the compatible Chinese.

Last May a Syrian military delegation visited Peking after plans to seek more weapons from Moscow fell through. However, China lacks the ability to provide as much aid as the Soviets, and has only a limited capacity to supply the spare parts needed to keep Soviet-made equipment running.

Chinese relations with the United Arab Republic, where Communist parties are illegal, have had ups and downs.

In December 1965, China was accused at a Cairo trial of giving funds to set up a pro-Peking Communist party. Cairo asked for the recall of the Chinese ambassador.

After the 1967 war, China hoped to capitalize on Egyptian disillusionment with the failure of Moscow to prevent an Arab defeat.

Although herself buying wheat from Australia, China offered Cairo 150,000 tons of wheat, plus $10 million in cash. But when President Gamal Abdel Nasser accepted the Soviets' "political solution" line at the Khartoum Arab summit, the Chinese offer was withdrawn.

Last month Premier Chou En-lai wrote to Nasser reaffirming China's support for Arab revolutionary movements and attacking President Nixon on the basis of early reports Israel would get U.S. Phantom jets. Nasser's reply avoided agreeing with Chou's endorsement of "protracted struggle."

The Chinese letter seemed aimed not so much at Nasser as at others in the Middle East. Chinese propagandists gave wide distribution to favorable comment from Syria, Iraq and Al Fatah.

During the Chinese cultural revolution, Cairo was the only capital in which a Chinese ambassador remained. He went back to Peking in mid-1969 and has not yet been replaced.

At the same time last year, new ambassadors were being sent by Peking to Syria and Algeria. They are the only nations directly involved in the Middle East situation in which China now has ambassadors.

THE 52D ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. JOHN E. HUNT

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, 52 years ago today—March 25, 1918—the independence of Byelorussia was proclaimed in the following solemn and determined words:

A year ago (1917), the peoples of Belorussia, together with all the peoples of Russia, threw off the yoke of Russian tsarism which, taking no advice from the people, had plunged our land into the blaze of war that ruined most of our cities and towns. Today, we, the Rada of the Belorussian National Republic, cast off from our country the last chains of the political servitude that had been imposed by Russian tsarism upon our free and independent land. From now on, the Belorussian National Republic is to be a free and independent power. The people of Belorussia themselves, through their own Constitutent Assembly, will decide upon the future relations of Belorussia with other states.

Consider, if you will, what it would be like if in this country on July 4th there were no patriotic speeches, no mass assemblies to pay tribute to our Founding Fathers, no stirring news commentaries on the history of our independence, no public prayers in recognition of our spiritual heritage, and, in fact, no other manifestation of freedom by which we might choose as individuals to mark the occasion of our own Declaration of Independence. There would in sum be nothing more than the shallow ring of commemorations, however sincere, of the occasion in some far off land and the private and reflecting thoughts of individuals in silent remembrance of a dream that used to be.

Impossible? No. Implausible? Yes, but only if we are ever mindful that the once free peoples of other less fortunate nations have succumbed to the brutal and suppressive aggression of communism. I view the commemoration of Byelorussian independence today, as well as the anniversaries of the declarations of independence of other captive nations, as continuing and forceful reminders that the hope of these people for freedom, independence, and the recognition of individual liberties rests on the leadership of the United States and the strength of the conviction of our own people in these principles.

CHICAGO BAR ASSOCIATION ENDORSES HANDGUN CONTROL ACT OF 1970

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, on March 3, I introduced H.R. 16250, the Handgun Control Act of 1970. The purpose of this bill is to dry up the huge supply of freely available handguns in America. Crime statistics show over and over again that it is the handgun—as opposed to the rifle and the shotgun—which is the criminal's favorite weapon. If we are serious about stopping violent street crime, we must face up to the necessity of limiting the availability of handguns.

I am most gratified to announce that the Chicago Bar Association has endorsed the Handgun Control Act as a necessary step toward the reduction of violence and street crime in America. I insert at this point in the RECORD a copy of the press release issued by the Chicago Bar Association endorsing the Handgun Control Act of 1970.

The document referred to follows:

HANDGUN CONTROL ACT OF 1970

The Chicago Bar Association urges the prompt enactment at both the Federal and State level of legislation imposing strict controls on the importation, manufacture, sale and purchase of hand guns. It supports the initiative of Representative Abner J. Mikva of Illinois in introducing Federal legislation for this purpose.

No arguments against such controls can, in our judgment, outweigh the urgent necessity of curbing the free availability of hand guns. We have just had another tragic killing of a policeman by a person armed with a hand gun. If we mean what we say about waging an unrelenting war against crime, we simply cannot tolerate the absence of effective gun controls. Possession of hand guns should be permitted only to the police and authorized security agencies.

It also follows that The Chicago Bar Association is strongly opposed to the effort to write into the Illinois Constitution a provision guaranteeing the right of citizens "to bear arms". The action of the Bill of Rights Committee of the Constitutional Convention in giving approval to such a provision is a serious mistake and we hope that it will be promptly corrected. If the provision is intended only to confirm what is already provided by the United States Constitution, it is completely unnecessary. If it is intended to go beyond the interpretation by the Supreme Court of the United States of the Federal provision, then we think that it is fraught with mischief and the possibility of abuse.

THE BOOKBURNERS ARE BACK

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, for years our people have been conditioned to accept filth, pornography, and socialistic doctrine in their schools under the cry of academic freedom. Any announced protest or opposition resulted in the cry of "bookburner," "censorship," and suppression of free thought and dissent. In fact, in many instances the decent people know better but have become tolerant of radically different thoughts and ideologies because they were sure that full, open, and frank discussion of all ideas, truth could never be hidden for long.

Now the bookburners are back again. This time the censors are not from the midstream of the decent societies, but rather a few extremists who would stifle any truth which might disagree with their radical views and goals.

In nearby Maryland, the Human Relations Council has removed from school libraries a book alleged to be racist. The offended family must suffer from reverse racist delusions, because the offense of the book was to show tolerant and kindly race relations.

At Yale, once considered a liberal institution of learning, even Tarzan has been suppressed as being "racist."

This hero of generations of young Americans can now join the other victims of history rewritten—"Amos and Andy," the wonderful Stephen Foster songs, the minstrel show, "Birth of a Nation," the Confederate flag, "Dixie," the State song of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and even decent English language have been convicted of "racist" overtones and abolished.

The bookburners are truly back. Americans, beware. Truth is under attack.

I include pertinent newsclippings in my remarks:

[From the Washington, (D.C.) Post, Mar. 13, 1970]

YALE BLACKS BLOCK TALK BY "TARZAN"

NEW HAVEN, CONN. March 12.—Tarzan of the Apes was forced to leave a speaking engagement Wednesday night at Yale University when a group of black student militants blocked the showing of his 1932 film, which they labeled "racist."

Johnny Weissmuller, 66 former Olympic swimming champion who rose to fame in Hollywood films as the jungle man, appeared at the Yale Law School auditorium as part of a "Tarzan film festival" sponsored by the Yale Record, an undergraduate humor magazine.

Weissmuller, on hand to discuss his 1932 film classic. "Tarzan the Ape Man," returned to New York City after members of the Yale's Black Student Alliance stood in front of the projector and prevented the film from being shown. A spokesman for the magazine said Weissmuller "took it well but was visibly hurt" by the incident.

About 200 students attended the festival. One was dressed in a loincloth and swung from a suspended rope. Invitations to the event said "black tie or loincloth" was the preferred dress.

PANEL TO SCREEN BOOKS OF MONTGOMERY SCHOOLS

The Montgomery County school system today announced the formation of a committee to review, and possibly revise, criteria and procedures for approving books and other school materials.

One of the group's main tasks will be to insure that any of the resulting guidelines provide "fair treatment" to Negroes and other minority groups.

Creation of the committee stems directly from the complaint of a Rockville couple, Mr. and Mrs. Ivan J. Wanless, Jr., about a book they considered to be "racially objectionable and offensive."

The Wanlesses objected to the dialect attributed to a Negro groom in the book, "The Little Fellow," and the "Sambo-type" expressions given him in the illustrations.

A 1945 edition of the book was subsequently removed from libraries in the county's elementary schools. A later edition, with the dialect removed but with the same illustrations, is still being used.

The five-member subcommittee of the school system's Human Relations Advisory Committee which recommended removal of the first edition, has now also called for removal of the later version because of the illustrations.

School officials have taken this recommendation under "serious advisement," a spokesman said, but are deferring any decision until the criteria and procedures are reviewed by the new committee.

"There are some personnel in the school system concerned about academic freedom and freedom of expression who have some concern about the banning of books," the spokesman said. He noted that removal of "The Little Fellow" from school libraries is "the first time in six years we actually have yanked a book off the shelves."

On the other hand, he said, "some of the rest of us have concern about literature that tends to stereotype any minority groups or cast certain segments of society in poor light.

"What we hope to do with the new committee is to look at the problem objectively and come up with criteria to use in reviewing any material."

The new committee will include the subcommittee which originally reviewed "The Little Fellow." These include a teacher, elementary principal, an area director, the director of the school system's operations division and the supervisor of social studies.

The group will be expanded to include a librarian and a senior high school principal.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING AUXILIARY PERSONNEL

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the very talented counsel for the House General Subcommittee on Education, Mr. John F. Jennings, recently delivered a speech on the legislative process which I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues.

I believe Mr. Jennings has properly captured the intricacies of legislating in the complex field of educational legislation.

His speech, which appeared in the February 1970, issue of the Journal of Home Economics, follows:

LEGISLATION AFFECTING AUXILIARY PERSONNEL

(By John F. Jennings)

Legislation often is a major determinant in the financing and control of programs for training and using auxiliary personnel. This speech and the question and answer session which followed helped participants at the AHEA Workshop on Utilization and Training of Auxiliary Personnel in Home Economics to understand the many types of existing legislation related to auxiliary personnel and to explore the need for initiating new legislation.

Legislation which affects the use of auxiliary personnel is a recent phenomenon in federal legislation. Only within the last five years have there been federal laws encouraging the use of para-professionals. Yet this is a vastly growing area and a very timely one for study.

As you know, two out of every five workers around the country are women, and this ratio will grow in the next few years because of the demands of our economy and because of the willingness now of women to go outside the home to work. We find that even though two out of five workers are women, women are discriminated against in employment. The average wage nationally for women workers is one-half of the average wage for men. Only 7 percent of employed women make over $10,000 a year, whereas the number of men who make over that amount is 20 times greater. Many women work at jobs which are far below both their ability and training. Last year one-fifth of all women college graduates who had finished four years at an accredited institution were working in such nonprofessional jobs as clerks and secretaries.

I mention these facts to you because a major problem involved in the use of auxiliary personnel is the reluctance on the part of professional people to employ them. Some people feel as though they are threatened by the presence of auxiliary personnel in their job setting.

A LARGE RESERVOIR OF TALENT

Paraprofessionals, or auxiliary personnel, to use a more limited term, can be helpful to you as professionals. As you know, home economics and the demands being made upon it are changing. The Commission on Technology, Automation, and Economic Progress in 1966 concluded that within the next 10 years we could easily use 5.3 million new jobs in the public sector. Many of these jobs are in areas in which traditionally home economics has been involved. Even though home economists are about 100,000 strong, we are finding that demands for home economics personnel will not be met by institutions of higher education. At the same time economic and social conditions exist in our country which give us a large reservoir of unused talent—mostly the disadvantaged. We find that today in the slum areas of our cities we have two and one-half times the rate of unemployment that we have in other areas of the country. By the end of the 1970's we are going to have 50 percent more nonwhites in their twenties, and these are the people who are the least trained and least prepared for occupations in our society.

Although we will have this vast increase in the number of unprepared people, the number of unskilled jobs will go down to 5 percent of the total number of jobs available at the end of the 1970's. And even people with skilled jobs will find themselves outmoded. By 1980 professional and technical jobs are going to far outdistance skilled craftsmen. Even if a person has certain skills, he may, by the end of the 70's, be out of a job. What are we going to do with this large reservoir of talent?

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR PARAPROFESSIONALS

Some types of paraprofessionals which the federal government is seeking to encourage are child care specialists, teacher aides, family planning aides, clothing aides, and so forth through the whole gamut of professions.

In the fall of 1969 we had a deficiency of 222,400 teachers in our schools. Most of these, 164,400, were in the elementary schools. This is the area where we can use auxiliary personnel to the best possible advantage. Presently we have approximately 100,000 teacher aides, but with the shortage of trained teachers, we have a need for many more.

Child care is another vastly growing need. The federal and state governments are encouraging the growth of day care centers. With the Head Start programs, nursery school and other day care programs, and migrant education programs, there is a need for auxiliary personnel. Professional personnel cannot handle all of the tasks put before them.

We also need paraprofessionals in mental health and welfare areas. We need government aides—people who can serve as ombudsmen, who can help reduce the alienation present not only among the disadvantaged population but also among our middle-class population caused by the feeling that they are not influencing the government, that the government is somehow "out there." Paraprofessionals, if they are used in these areas, can help reduce this gap between government and citizens.

Paraprofessionals obviously can be used in clothing, interior decorating, food service, and other areas.

The federal government has seen this need and at the same time it has seen the large numbers of disadvantaged in our population who do not have jobs or a chance for a career because they have been excluded from the schools both by their own attitudes and by the schools themselves. So the federal government, since 1964, has enacted two major pieces of legislation which encourage the use of paraprofessionals. Under this legislation, five programs presently are funded and in operation today.

UNDER THE ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ACT

Under the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, three programs use paraprofessionals.

The new careers program

The major program under this Act is the New Careers program. Congress was impressed by the program's potential for twinning the need for professional personnel with our reservoir of unused talent. Since 1964, actually since 1965 when the program was funded, over 20,000 people have been trained in the New Careers program. These people include health specialists, dietetic aides, child care aides, and teacher aides.

As you know, the concept behind New Careers is that you place a person in an entry level job where the skills are relatively minimal. Then you build into that job components which will increase the person's sophistication both in general knowledge and also in the skill for the job so that he can advance up a career ladder until he eventually attains the professional level.

The New Careers program, the first major-scale program of this type, has had problems with confusing guidelines, with the reluctance of professional personnel to take nonprofessionals in, and with the disadvantaged themselves who have been very skeptical about the program. But it has been a success to a limited degree. Since 1964, New Careers has been known as the program most easily identifiable with federal support for paraprofessionals, and its type of approach has been written into many other pieces of legislation.

The Head Start program

Under the Economic Opportunity Act, the second major program which uses paraprofessionals is the Head Start program. This differs from the New Careers type of program in that it is not anticipated that all the people in the program will move up a career ladder and eventually become professionals. Many people who have been excluded by the normal job requirements are given an opportunity to get into a field and gradually advance as their own willingness dictates. Presently under the Head Start program, which is geared toward poor children in the early years before school and which seeks to give them some sort of compensatory education to prepare them for school, approximately 25,000 paraprofessionals are being used.

The community action program

Another related program under the Economic Opportunity Act is the Community Action Program (CAP). Under the Economic Opportunity Act, local agencies were set up for coordinating or for initiating or operating local antipoverty efforts. The Office of Economic Opportunity estimates that there are approximately 20,000 auxiliary personnel involved in various local programs conducted by CAP agencies.

UNDER THE EDUCATION ACT

The second major federal act which encourages the use of auxiliary personnel is the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

Title I

The major program under this Act is Title I. This program which the federal government funds at approximately a billion dollars a year is meant for compensatory education—to concentrate in areas of greatest need within cities and rural areas, giving disadvantaged students an opportunity to compensate for their different types of backgrounds.

Approximately 100,000 paraprofessionals will be hired under Title I during the fiscal year 1970. It is estimated that by fiscal 1977, there might be 1.5 million paraprofessionals involved in these programs as teachers' aides. Most of these people—as in the Head Start program and the CAP agencies—are drawn from the community itself and are put into the classroom to supervise the children, do clerical work, and otherwise provide a link between the school and community.

Title VII

The second type of program under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act is the bilingual education program. Title VII. This program is geared toward poor areas where children, by reason of their ethnic backgrounds, are not conversant in English. Most schools by state law require instruction only in English. Only within the last couple of years have several states, such as California and Texas, sought to loosen their requirements for the use of English in the classroom. Teacher aides are used in this program to supervise youngsters in the classroom, grade papers, and do the tasks which detract the teacher's attention away from the major task of educating the child. There are not many aides under the program, but it also serves as a link between the community and the school.

Under these five programs which have been in operation only since 1965, three under the Economic Opportunity Act, two under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the federal government is supporting approximately 170,000 paraprofessionals. They range from auxiliary personnel who are solely attached to a professional to help with simple tasks, to the New Careers type person who is supposed to advance up a ladder and become an assistant teacher and then a certified teacher.

NINE NEW PROGRAMS

Besides these five major programs presently funded, Congress has authorized within the last three years nine new programs for the use of paraprofessionals. As I briefly described these nine new programs, bear in mind that all of these programs have been enacted within the last three years—especially in the 90th Congress in 1967 and 1968.

The first, the Health Manpower Act of 1968, provides the same type of program as the New Careers program under the Economic Opportunity Act. But it zeroes in on health professions, seeking to broaden training in areas such as dentistry, podiatry, medicine, and psychiatry. This program, just getting under way, is administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW).

The second new program is under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act of 1968. This, too, is a program newly authorized last year by the 90th Congress. It seeks to use the same type of New Careers thinking to get handicapped people to advance a career ladder starting with an entry skill job so they can learn greater skills and more sophistication and eventually move up to a professional level.

The Housing Act of 1968 is the third new act which authorizes the use of paraprofessionals. Paraprofessionals under this Act are to be used in local, state, and federal government agencies. The reasoning behind this is that frequently people from the community can provide a better link between the government and the community.

The Higher Education Act of 1968 authorizes the fourth program. It also is concerned basically with the use of paraprofessionals in public service. The purpose of this program is to get people who are in college interested in government while they are in school so that they can take a job which would advance them up to a professional level when they gain their college degree.

The fifth new program is under the Social Security Amendments of 1967. As this Act has been interpreted by HEW, paraprofessionals will be required to be used in all states in this fiscal year which began July 1, 1969. Every state must use paraprofessional personnel in social welfare programs. As you know, the federal government is involved in seven public welfare programs such as old age insurance, disability, and Aid to Families with Dependent Children. It also seeks to involve people from the community in the programs and to provide a link between the community and the government.

The sixth new program is under the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968. This Act, passed by the 90th Congress, is a massive program to provide assistance to the states and to the local police departments for the control of crime. The paraprofessionals under this Act would be limited to community relations specialists, which I think is a euphemistic term for people from the community relationships and again provide a linkage between the community and one of the institutions, namely, the police department.

The Juvenile Delinquency Act of 1968 is geared toward providing a link between youth who are delinquent or in danger of becoming delinquent and the institutions of society. These programs are for the use and training of paraprofessionals in the diagnosis, treatment, and rehabilitation of people who are delinquent or conceivably could become delinquent. This program, too, is administered by HEW and is just getting under way in this fiscal year.

The eighth program is the Handicapped Children's Early Education Act of 1968. It seeks to use auxiliary personnel as with the Head Start approach (but not limited to poverty youngsters) in programs for the early education of handicapped children.

The last program is under the Vocational Education Amendments of 1968 which authorize the use of subprofessionals in the basic state-grant program. In other programs under the Amendments the Office of Education and the states jointly administer the research and exemplary programs, both of which encourage the training of paraprofessionals.

EMPHASIS ON DISADVANTAGED

It may seem that the federal government is involved mostly with the use of paraprofessionals in disadvantaged areas. This is true. The 89th and 90th Congresses have been concerned especially with the problems of the disadvantaged in our communities, of trying to bring them into society's mainstream. Consequently, most of the social welfare legislation has sought to bring these people into our institutions, primarily through the use of paraprofessionals and programs aimed specifically at the disadvantaged.

This is just a starting point. The federal government now will begin to fund programs under some of these and other acts for the use of nonpoor paraprofessionals. Auxiliary personnel should not be stigmatized as the dropouts or as the "pushouts" of our society—people who are not able to cope because of their attitudes, backgrounds, or the hostility of the system toward them. The idea of paraprofessionals can be used in a broader sense. However, these have been the programs funded by the federal government. State, local and private industry funds also are being spent in other programs using paraprofessionals.

EDUCATION HAS FAILED MANY

This gets into the question of our educational system. Last year the House General Subcommittee on Education reviewed vocational education throughout the country and found that the educational system is failing many youngsters. Even though vocational education has 8 million enrollees ranging from children to adults, and even though many of these people are being adequately trained and well-placed in jobs through vocational education, the needs of a large part of our population are not being met. More importantly, their potential is not being used. This is why, in the Vocational Education Amendments of 1968, Congress emphasizes the disadvantaged.

Under the Vocational Education Act of 1963, Congress had said that vocational education must meet the needs and tap the talents of disadvantaged youngsters. Yet Congress found that less than 1 percent of the federal funds since 1963 had been used on programs for the disadvantaged. Congress was quite concerned about this. Since three-quarters of a million youngsters drop out of school every year, and almost one-fourth of our 18-year-olds, our educational system must be failing these young people. We find that if these children are not taught in the schools, they will have to be picked up later under manpower remedial programs which spend up to $12,000 per trainee to remedy the impairments to employment which were not caught earlier by the schools or which were caused by the schools.

There is no sense in the federal government's being concerned with the employment of its citizens and yet not investing money in job training in the schools so that people can be taught before they become set in attitudes which preclude them from wanting to or being able to work later. Vocational education had been at fault because it had not reoriented its programs toward the disadvantaged. But Congress also found itself to be at fault because it was appropriating $14 for higher education for every dollar that it was appropriating for vocational education, and it was appropriating $4 for remedial education programs for every dollar appropriated for vocational education. It does not make sense to direct 80 percent of our resources nationally toward higher education and academic programs when only 20 percent of the student population will attain a college degree. What happens to the other 80 percent who drop out somewhere along the line? Only 20 percent of our resources are being used on these people. So Congress decided that in the Vocational Education Amendments of 1968 it would turn to occupational education to meet some of these needs.

CHALLENGE TO VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Congress challenged vocational education, first of all, to put its house in order, which means to emphasize new job programs and concepts such as the "cluster concept," where you teach the child several related skills so that he will not be tied down later to one job.

It challenged home economics to get into the new area of training for the dual role of homemaking and wage earning. Traditionally, home economics has been challenged to train people for homemaking, but now it is being called upon also to train people for jobs.

In addition, home economists are now being asked, as are all those in vocational education, to address themselves to the problems of the disadvantaged. Congress said that in every state one-third of the money under the home economics section must be used for consumer programs in economically depressed area. That means that if states are not doing it now, regardless of whether there is new money or not, they will have to have consumer education programs in ghetto, slum, and other economically depressed areas.

But both Congressman Roman Pucinski and I have been much impressed by the fact that vocational educators are ready and willing to change. This last year, the House of Representatives increased the appropriation for vocational education from approximately $280 million to almost $490 million. Much of this is meant to be used for programs in new occupational skills and for certain groups of the population such as the disadvantaged and the handicapped. [Note: In the final appropriations bill presented by the Congress, vocational education was increased about $210 million over the $279 million President Nixon sought and in January the President vetoed the bill.]

PREPARE FOR NEW MONEY

Vocational educators are being told to change. They are ready to change, and yet the money is not there. If they do receive this new money, one of their tasks will be to decide how they are going to spend it in a relatively short time. But they must be prepared because there will be an accounting due for the money and if vocational education wants to keep Congress' confidence, it must be ready to move into new occupational fields and to serve all segments of the population.

I hope that from this conference, where you have considered the use of auxiliary personnel, you will start to think about how you can use some of this money from vocational education. I know that you are not all teachers in vocational education, or even in programs presently funded by vocational education, but under the new Act the categories of funding have been broadened to include many private and public institutions which were not eligible before. You are being challenged by Congress. I hope that this conference will help you to think about ways in which you can meet this challenge during the next school year and hopefully during the next decade.

WHY NOT COP MORATORIUM?

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Lyn Daunoras, feature editor of the Summit Valley Times, Lyons, Ill., raises fascinating questions concerning the philosophy of the notorious radical, Jerry Rubin, in her column Wednesday, March 18 in the Times. This column is one of the most interesting and thought-provoking commentaries on the subject that I have come across and, therefore I insert it into the RECORD for whatever attention it may receive:

WHY NOT COP MORATORIUM?

(By Lyn Daunoras)

On a TV show recently Jerry Rubin, leader of the Yippies and a vocal member of the Conspiracy Seven, advocated, among other things, the release of all prisoners.

No one should have to sit in jail; this is the lowest form for man to live and there is no reason for such abominable treatment of our fellow man, he averred.

So we start thinking about a world without jails. We're always willing to conjure up the scene that would ensue if these radicals got their way. The first thing that came to mind was that we needed no policemen or judges, since we weren't going to worry about laws and their violation (after all, that is the main reason people go to jail).

So we release all the murders, rapists, thieves and vandals and let them know they can do whatever they want, kill whomever they desire and no one will put them back in that nasty old jail cell again.

Of course, under these circumstances, there will be little need for attorneys either. Close a motagage deal or make out a will, you say? Shucks, going to school six years just to do insignificant things, which won't make a decent living for a professional man, is hardly worth it. We can make our own wills presuming we have anything left to leave and as for mortgages—who will own property under Rubin? He wants no private property, only communes. So who needs lawyers?

Unfortunately, law men are not the only ones who will be unemployed. What man in his right mind would care to construct new buildings when there is no one to protect them and so many to destroy them? Throw out the carpenters, masons and sheet metal workers, too.

Think of the fun we can have with no one to stop us. We can shoot down or in other ways eliminate pesty visitors, unfriendly neighbors or noisy kids. We can run down pedestrians we don't like the looks of—especially if they look at all affluent.

This is freedom! It's Rubin's idea of freedom. Imagine the Sirhans and the Specks roaming the streets with no fear of jail? One thing we know for certain, if Rubin runs for office, he'll surely get the prison vote (after he releases them, that is).

In line with this thought, we propose a police moratorium day. The peace-lovers had their moratoriums, why not the police? How about 24 hours, without pay, of course, since "the taxpayers pay their salaries," without any police protection?

This means no arrests, no help of any kind. Let everyone have fun at everyone else's expense. They can break windows, beat up old and small people, rob people blind, break in homes and club, shoot or kill anyone who gets in their way. Let them speed at 60 in a 30-mile zone. It's one answer to the population explosion.

Perhaps when all the smoke dies down, the silent majority will have finally found their voices and will use them. It takes something drastic to move the spirit and a police moratorium day would be as drastic as things can get.

The idea of prisoners running free and others letting loose their restrained inhibitions may just arouse people enough to put someone like Jerry Rubin in his place.

The only way to show people who think "Rubin has a point" and those who feel sorry for the poor little smart boy who wants a new world is to give them a taste of that world Rubin advocates.

They might not be so sympathetic when they have to cope with it.

JOIN THE MARCH FOR VICTORY

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, here in Washington, we have seen ad nauseam the parades, marches, demonstrations, and the other activities of those dupes in this country who are aiding the enemy in Hanoi, Peiping, and Moscow.

We have witnessed the desecration of the churches of virtually every denomination, with the pulpits filled by those who would mislead our people down the paths of the new atheistic ritual called humanism—the cult of Lenin the butcher.

The International Council of Churches, representing the great silent, but awakening, majority of loyal Christian Americans has made arrangements for a parade on April 4, 1970, honoring—not mocking—the American virtues. Its full page, paid ad in the local newspaper is worth the attention of all of us, and I include it in my remarks, and invite our colleagues to join in this truly American venture:

[From the Washington (D.C.) Evening Star, Mar. 24, 1970]

JOIN THE MARCH FOR VICTORY, SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1970, PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE 4TH TO 15TH, MONUMENT GROUNDS, WASHINGTON, D.C.

ALL ARE WELCOME

This is an appeal to all who believe in God and who want the words on our coins, "In God We Trust," to be meaningful in our national life and in winning the war in Vietnam.

47,000 of our choicest youth have died in the war. Shall this continue for another ten years? Surrender is unthinkable. Retreat and defeat are unacceptable to patriots. Victory, and bringing the boys home with honor and a secure peace is the cry which is in our hearts and our prayer to the living God.

The new MOBE and the hippies who came to Washington on November 15, 1969, called our American society "a death machine," demanded withdrawal of all American troops now. Hanoi's radio on February 15, 1967, told the world: "It is clear that the American people's protest movement has become a real second front against U.S. imperialists on the very soil of America. It is the largest, most stirring, and best organized mass movement in U.S. history."

The Paris peace conference has been nothing but a base for Communist propaganda. The black militants, in the Black Manifesto, called our society the most "barbaric" and they want its destruction. Communism, with its repudiation of God and human freedom and dignity, is on its way to take over the world.

Lenin, whose birthday is April 22nd and whose 100th anniversary is being celebrated by the Communist world said: "We have never made a secret of it that our revolution is only the beginning and in order that it may be brought to a victorious conclusion, we will have to light the flames of revolution throughout the entire world. . . ."

The war could and should have been won long ago, Admiral U.S. Grant Sharp, USN (Ret.), in his article in the May, 1969, Reader's Digest said, "We could have won the war long ago—perhaps by the end of 1967. . . . Of all the things we should have done but did not do, the most important was to neutralize the port of Haiphong. . . . We should have destroyed the enemy's stockpiles of material on the docks at Haiphong and in the centers of the cities of Haiphong and Hanoi . . . vast amounts of ammunition reached South Vietnam where it was used to kill American and other Allied soldiers." The presence of 15,000 vehicles on the Ho Chi Minh Trail this month and the transporting of the largest contingent of supplies into South Vietnam since the war began, reveal the folly of our "no-win," appeasement policy.

Senator Barry M. Goldwater has just said, "We still can't bomb targets over there that would end the war. There is no reason in my mind for Haiphong (the major North Vietnamese port) being anything but a mud puddle." Our failure to make it a mud puddle has provided a puddle of American blood in South Vietnam, the blood of our beloved heroes, our sons. Those who are responsible for this folly and the loss of these lives must be held to account by the American public!

Daniel P. Moynihan, counsellor to President Nixon, in his confidential memorandum to the President 17 days before Nixon's inauguration, wrote: "At the risk of seeming cynical, I would argue that the war in Vietnam has become a disastrous mistake because we lost it." President Nixon's present plan is an attempt to conceal this defeat, and it will deliver to the Communists the victory of which they constantly boast.

General of the Army, Omar N. Bradley (Ret.), speaking before the National Press Club luncheon, said, "I can't believe that a country as large as we have could not win it if we set our minds to it." "I think we are fighting as much for ourselves as for the South Vietnamese," and Bradley expressed the conviction that "our greatest danger is imperialist communism" and "those Communist countries which wish to spread their domination throughout the world under the guise of Communist utopia." (Army Times, March 18, 1970).

We must abandon the entire "no-win" approach and put victory back on the battlefield and back in the vocabulary of the President of the United States. We call upon the President, as the Commander-in-chief of all our Armed Forces to issue the necessary orders for the military to win the war in the quickest possible time with the loss of the fewest lives on all sides. If the President desires to bring the boys home, let him first bring home the 1,400 prisoners of war. And, if Hanoi will not honor the Geneva Convention, then he should give orders to go in and bring these American heroes out! Honor, self-respect, and the highest obligations of freedom dictate no compromise and no surrender.

President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam, in his interview with U.S. News & World Report March 16 said, "South Vietnam cannot defend itself against a rush from Communist China or from the whole Communist bloc. If you leave a vacuum here, if you withdraw all your troops, what will happen? Communist China will swarm in and exploit it. What happened when you left a vacuum in Europe? The Russians swarmed in. What happened when you left a vacuum in Korea? The North Koreans swarmed in."

The only language which the Communists know is the language of force. They have no God to fear and as our resolve weakens and we are surfeited with our comforts, they exploit every gain.

"The fear of man bringeth a snare." Proverbs 29:25. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge." Proverbs 1:7.

Once this country asserts its strength because of our fear of God and our determination to preserve our heritage, the whole tide of battle, the whole world-wide conspiracy of the Communists, can be effectively exposed and met.

The March for Victory is a religious and patriotic demonstration. All are invited to participate in it. In Mainland China not a church is open. All missionaries are gone. In Russia the churches which are open are exhibits for deception. The Jews, too, are being destroyed. There is here now a spontaneous upsurge which has come by the stern realization that the forces of tyranny, riot, revolution, war, have organized to destroy the United States of America. And as this nation goes down then civilization will go into eclipse under the heel of a brutal slavery where man has no soul and all is the property of the state. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Matthew 4:4.

Religious groups from every section of the nation, with patriotic, veteran, refugee groups and many others are joining to make this the largest manifestation, we believe, ever seen in the nation's capital in behalf of victory.

General Douglas MacArthur said there is no substitute for victory, and had he been permitted to bomb beyond the Yalu River and unite Korea, we would not have spent billions of dollars and even today have 52,000 United States men in South Korea. We must return to the spirit of World War I and World War II.

A dispatch from Da Nang, March 8, quotes retiring U.S. Marine Commander, Lt. Gen. Herman Nickerson Jr., as saying he is "disappointed in the silent majority" for failing to honor Americans who have been killed and wounded in the war. "There are relatively few places where they waved flags and honored our servicemen like they did in the great days when the boys came home with honor."

The tragedy is that President Nixon has forsaken the high and honorable position that he himself championed in 1964. His three articles in the Reader's Digest magazine were magnificent. In the January issue he called for the removal of the Russians from the captive nations. In the August issue he said, "We must recognize that we are in a life and death struggle that has repercussions far beyond Vietnam and that victory is essential to the survival of freedom." In the November issue he wanted Cuba to be liberated. This is the President millions thought they were electing.

The No. 1 problem and concern of every American must be, as long as a single American boy is shedding his blood, that it be not in vain and that the war be brought to a victorious conclusion. As soon as the Communists learn that this is our policy, they will soon sue for peace. We have spent multiplied billions for our defenses and all the strength of this nation—yes, the military-industrial complex for which we thank God—must be marshalled and with such power, victory will be ours.

"In the name of our God we will set up our banners" (Psa. 20:5) the greatest factor which the American people are now disdaining is the fact that "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear." (Psa. 46:1,2). And thus we pray, "Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked: further not his wicked device; lest they exalt themselves. . . . Let not an evil speaker be established in the earth: evil shall hunt the violent man to overthrow him." (Psa. 140:8,11).

Had our nation refused to aid the godless power of communism, it would not have helped build our enemy in strength to plague us, to "hunt" us.

We came from the battlefields victorious in World War II, with strength to preserve the peace of the world and now have been victimized by a godless conspiracy causing us to retreat in the presence of their troops as they mass them against us in Vietnam and Laos. "And Ephraim being armed and carrying bows turned back in the day of battle." (Psa. 78: 9).

Could it be that the internal activities of the Communists are also responsible? J. Edgar Hoover reported to the Subcommittee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, 87th Congress, March 6, 1961:

"The Communists, foreign agents and potential saboteurs operate behind a masquerade of stealth and deception. They are all-out masters in the art of tactical infiltration, a fact which has been clearly demonstrated by our investigative experience.

"Some 200 known, or suspected, Communist front and Communist-infiltrated organizations are now under investigation by the FBI. Many of these fronts are national in scope with chapters in various cities throughout the United States. They represent transmission belts through which the Communist Party furthers its conspiratorial designs.

"They have infiltrated every conceivable sphere of activity; youth groups; radio, television, and motion picture industries; church, school, educational and cultural groups; the press; nationality minority groups and civil and political units. . . .

"The Soviet intelligence services have reorganized, multiplied their contacts with the American people, and have become aggressively bolder in spearheading their espionage offensive against the United States. The intelligence organizations of the satellite countries, carefully co-ordinated under Soviet leadership and control, have gained increasingly in experience and ability. . . .

"While the Communists speak of peace, their intelligence setup is the most extensive in world history. . . .

"The espionage potential of the Soviet bloc is tremendous. The extreme security hazard inherent in their operations is indicated somewhat by the fact that in June 1960 our State Department estimated that Russian and Chinese Communists bloc countries have some 300,000 trained spies serving throughout the world."

Our March for Victory will be a breakthrough. At last the pressures which have been built up as a result of grievances—prayer and Bible reading thrown out of school; freedom of choice and education being denied; the liberal leftist program which corresponds to much of the Communist demand will be exposed; at last Washington will see on April 4th a gathering together of those who out of fear of God and love of country will be present to march, to pray, to sing, to listen to the patriots, and to join in that last verse of our national anthem:

"Oh, thus be it ever when freemen shall stand
Between their loved homes and the war's desolution;
Blest with vict'ry and peace, may the Heav'n-rescued land
Praise the Pow'r that has made and preserved us a nation!
Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just;
And this be our motto: 'In God is our trust!'
And the star-spangled banner in truimph shall wave
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the home of the brave."

The Palm Sunday march sent the Saviour into Jerusalem. Joshua's march around Jericho brought the walls tumbling down. May the March For Victory be used of God to help return America to the faith of her fathers.

Buses are coming to Washington from every section of the eastern part of the United States. Charter planes and private planes have been engaged to bring those dedicated to victory to the march. At last something has been done which challenges the mass media, the brainwashing, the pollution of our atmosphere, for victory. The cry for victory is breaking through!

The decision to hold this march was made November 11 and a most thrilling development is the manner in which the women across the nation have rallied to the leadership of this cause. Like the women of Brazil they are determined to save the United States from communism. Whole families are coming. Baby carriages will be seen on Pennsylvania Avenue. Expected are 2,500 Cuban refugees who will be marching in one delegation. An Indian chief from Wyoming is to be present. Every group will bring its own banners and signs. The Viet Cong flag was carried down Pennsylvania Avenue on November 15 and the U.S. flag was carried upside down. Now, in the March For Victory, it will be Old Glory, and the Stars and Stripes forever!

When the International Council of Christian Churches met in its Seventh World Congress in Cape May, N.J., August, 1968, the 3,000 delegates representing 140 denominations, voted unanimously for victory and called upon the free world to win the war and to win victory over communism. The resolution stated:

"Communism, which is anti-God, anti-Christ, anti-men and anti-freedom, is an instrument of Satan and as such must be challenged in the name of God, truth, righteousness.

"The ICCC opposes aiding the Communists in any way and especially when their agents and armaments are killing those who fight for freedom in Vietnam. Peaceful coexistence with communism is morally impossible.

"The ICCC identifies itself with the Christians in Russia who are worshiping in the underground.

"The ICCC exposes and opposes all use of the churches by the Communist conspiracy.

"Communism cannot be appeased; it must be exposed and opposed until it is defeated and its imperialistic policies ended. This Council of Churches summons all Christians to the conflict and warns the nations that even peace and peace conferences are strategies of war for the Marxists.

"This Council prays for the day of liberation of Mainland China, North Korea, Russia, the Eastern European lands, Cuba and North Vietnam, and calls upon world leaders to re-evaluate programs which give communism advantage.

"We commend South Vietnam, the United States of America, Korea, Australia, New Zealand, Thailand, the Philippines, and all fighting in Vietnam in the battle against communism. We declare that the struggle in Vietnam must not be relaxed until victory is won. The United States is not the aggressor in Vietnam as the Fourth Assembly of the World Council of Churches officially charged in Uppsala, Sweden, last month. The Communists have always been the aggressors with the world-wide Communist conspiracy promoting it.

"The ICCC calls upon the youth of the churches to give themselves wholeheartedly for freedom in the ideological struggle and repudiate the youth movements which are rebelling against serving their country against Communist tyrannies. To this end, the ICCC appeals to the living God, whose Son warned us: 'No man can enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house' (Mark 3: 27). May God enable the free nations to remain strong and courageous, and may He answer the prayers of all of His people for mercy and help."

THIS IS OUR SPRING OFFENSIVE FOR FREEDOM

It is Easter and the whole Christian world is rejoicing in the victory that Jesus Christ won on the cross, His triumph over death and the grave by His resurrection. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" (Rom. 8:31) and it is the faith which the Christians have, born of victory in their great salvation, that enables us to fight and to ask all to join in this fight for victory in Vietnam. This magnificent march with thousands and thousands participating could be the last chance that free men have, or it could be the beginning of a great deliverance, a turning of the tide when free men shall be delivered of despair and confusion. We invite you to join us in the March for Victory. All you need to do is to be there, and with the Communist world watching, every man counts. We invite you on your own responsibility under God to be present with us in Washington April 4th. A MEMORANDUM ON THE PROPOSED EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

HON. MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I spread upon the RECORD a memorandum on the proposed equal rights amendment to the U.S. Constitution as prepared by a study group of the Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

THE PROPOSED EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION—A MEMORANDUM

(By the Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Washington, D.C., March 1970)

This paper was presented to the Council by its study group on equal legal rights: Sarah Jane Cunningham, Chairman, Virginia R. Allan, Lorraine L. Blair, Rachel E. Scott, Irene Wischer; Mary Eastwood, Technical Staff.)

The proposed equal rights amendment to the U.S. Constitution would provide that "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex," and would authorize the Congress and the States to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation.[1]

The purpose of the proposed amendment would be to provide constitutional protection against laws and official practices that treat men and women differently. At the present time, the extent to which women may invoke the protection of the Constitution against laws which discriminate on the basis of sex is unclear. The equal rights amendment would insure equal rights under the law for men and women and would secure the right of all persons to equal treatment under the laws and official practices without differentiation based on sex.

Joint resolutions proposing that the equal rights amendment be approved for submission to the States for ratification have been sponsored by 75 Senators and 225 Members of the House of Representatives in this (91st) Congress (as of March 11, 1970). Adoption of the amendments would require a ⅔ vote of both Houses of Congress and ratification by ¾ of the States. Thus there are already more than the necessary number of Senators who are committed to support the amendment for its approval by the Senate. These joint resolutions are currently pending in the respective Senate and House Judiciary Committees.

The Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women, at its meeting February 7, 1970, endorsed the equal rights amendment, adopting the following resolution:

The Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women endorses the proposed Equal Rights Amendment to the United States Constitution and recommends that the Interdepartmental Committee on the Status of Women urge the President to immediately request the passage of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment by the Congress of the United States.

The Council's recommendation was transmitted to the President on February 13, 1970.

HISTORY OF THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Resolutions proposing an equal rights amendment have been introduced in every Congress since 1923. Hearings were held by the House and Senate Judiciary Committees in 1948 and 1956, respectively.[2] The amendment has been repeatedly reported favorably by the Senate Judiciary Committee, most recently in 1964 (S. Rept. No. 1558, 88th Cong., 2d Sess.), and has twice passed the Senate, in 1950 and 1953.

Both times it was passed, however, with the so-called "Hayden rider," which provided that the equal rights amendment "shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits, or exemptions now or hereafter conferred by law, upon persons of the female sex." [3] Both times the rider accomplished its purpose of killing the proposed amendment since, as the Senate Judiciary Committee has noted, the rider's "qualification is not acceptable to women who want equal rights under the law. It is under the guise of so-called 'rights' or 'benefits' that women have been treated unequally and denied opportunities which are available to men." (S. Rept. No. 1558, supra)

Since the proposed equal rights amendment has failed to pass Congress for the past 47 years, it may appear to be a loser, although admittedly it took women more than 50 years to secure the adoption of the 19th amendment. However, a revival of the feminist movement has occured during the past four years and it is greatly increasing in momentum, especially among younger women. Thus the demand for equal rights and support for the amendment is becoming more widespread, with a corresponding increase in likelihood of early adoption of the amendment.

LAWS WHICH DISCRIMINATE ON THE BASIS OF SEX

A number of studies have been made in recent years by the President's Commission on the Status of Women, the Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and State commissions on the status of women concerning the various types of laws which distinguish on the basis of sex.[4] Opposition to the equal rights amendment in the past has been based in part on "fear of the unknown," i.e., lack of information concerning the types of laws which distinguish on the basis of sex and would therefore be affected by the amendment. Further delay in approving the amendment thus need not await any further study of the kinds of laws that discriminate on the basis of sex.

These studies have shown that numerous distinctions based on sex still exist in the law. For example:

1. State laws placing special restrictions on women with respect to hours of work and weightlifting on the job;

2. State law prohibiting women from working in certain occupations;

3. Laws and practices operating to exclude women from State colleges and universities (including higher standards required for women applicants to institutions of higher learning and in the administration of scholarship programs);

4. Discrimination in employment by State and local governments;

5. Dual pay schedules for men and women public school teachers;

6. State laws providing for alimony to be awarded, under certain circumstances, to ex-wives but not to ex-husbands;

7. State laws placing special restrictions on the legal capacity of married women or on their right to establish a legal domicile;

8. State laws that requires married women but not married men to go through a formal procedure and obtain court approval before they may engage in an independent business.[5]

9. Social Security and other social benefits legislation which give greater benefits to one sex than to the other;

10. Discriminatory preferences, based on sex, in child custody cases;

11. State laws providing that the father is the natural guardian of the minor children; [6]

12. Different ages for males and females in (a) child labor laws, (b) age for marriage, (c) cutoff of the right to parental support, and (d) juvenile court jurisdiction;

13. Exclusion of women from the requirements of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967;

14. Special sex-based exemptions for women in selection of State juries;

15. Heavier criminal penalties for female offenders than for male offenders committing the same crime.

Although it is possible that these and other discriminations might eventually be corrected by legislation, legislative remedies are not adequate substitutes for fundamental constitutional protection against discrimination. Any class of persons (i.e., women) which cannot successfully invoke the protection of the Constitution against discriminatory treatment is by definition comprised of "second class citizens" and is inferior in the eyes of law.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN UNDER EXISTING CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

The Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The Federal government is similarly restricted from interfering with these individual rights, under the "due process clause" of the Fifth Amendment.

During the past century, women have been largely unsuccessful in seeking judicial relief from sex discrimination in cases challenging the constitutionality of discriminatory laws under these provisions. As the Committee on Civil and Political Rights, President's Commission on the Status of Women, noted in its 1963 Report,

In no 14th amendment case alleging discrimination on account of sex has the United States Supreme Court held that a law classifying persons on the basis of sex is unreasonable and therefore unconstitutional.[7]

In 1874, the Supreme Court held that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, protected from abridgment by the States under the Fourteenth Amendment, did not confer upon women the right to vote, although the Court conceded that women were persons and citizens within the meaning of the amendment.[8] Similarly, the privileges and immunities clause was held not to confer on women the right to practice law.[9]

The constitutionality of State laws regulating the employment of women (but not men) was upheld in a number of cases brought between 1908 and 1937: maximum hours laws,[10] laws prohibiting night work for women,[11] and laws requiring a minimum wage for women.[12] In 1948, the Court upheld a Michigan law prohibiting (with certain exceptions) the licensing of women as bartenders.[13]

A Florida law providing that women not be called for jury service unless she registers with the clerk of court her desire to serve was held not violative of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1961.[14] However, more recently, a three-judge Federal court in Alabama held that State's law excluding women from jury service violated the rights of women under the Fourteenth Amendment stating:

The Constitution of the United States must be read as embodying general principles meant to govern society and the institutions of government as they evolve through time. It is therefore this Court's function to apply the Constitution as a living document to the legal cases and controversies of contemporary society.

The Alabama statute that denies women the right to serve on juries . . . violates that provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States that forbids any state to "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The plain effect of this constitutional provision is to prohibit prejudicial disparities before the law. This means prejudicial disparities for all citizens—including women. White v. Crook, 251 F. Supp. 401, 408 (M.D. Ala., 1969).

In Abbot v. Mines, 411 F. 2d 353 (C.A. 6, 1969) the Court reversed a case in which the trial judge had dismissed women jurors from the panel because the evidence in the case required testimony concerning cancer of the male genitals. The Court of Appeals stated:

It is common knowledge that society no longer coddles women from the very real and sometimes brutal facts of life. Women, moreover, do not seek such oblivion.

The District Judge's desire to avoid embarrassment to the women jurors is understandable and commendable but such sentiments must be subordinated to constitutional mandates. 411 F. 2d at 355.

As recently as ten years ago, the Supreme Court declined to hear a case in which the Texas Court of Civil Appeals had upheld the exclusion of women from a State college, Texas A & M.[15]

In February 1970 a three-judge Federal court dismissed as "moot" a class action in which women sought to desegregate various all male and all female public institutions of higher learning in the State of Virginia. However, the Court had previously ordered the University to consider without regard to sex the women plaintiffs' applications for admission to the University of Virginia at Charlottesville and to submit a three-year plan for desegregating the University at Charlottesville. Kirstein et al. v. The Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, etc., et al. (E.D. Va., Richmond Div. Civil No. 220-69-R).

Although there are very few female criminals as compared to male criminals, some laws provide for longer prison terms for women than for men committing the same crime. Such laws in Pennsylvania and Connecticut have been held to be inconsistent with the equal protection guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.[16]

Thus, in at least two areas—jury service and criminal penalties—women appear to have made progress in invoking the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although jury service is important as a practical matter it is hardly central to the lives of women. Criminal penalties are of real significance to only a very few women. Moreover, the court decisions have not wiped out discrimination even in these areas. The Kirstein case noted above represents some progress in an area vital to women—education, but the extent to which women may insist on equal educational opportunities under the Constitution still remains unclear.

Different treatment of men and women for purposes of computing social security benefits has been held not to violate the right to due process and equal protection of the laws. Gruenwald v. Gardner, 390 F. 2d 591 (C.A. 2, 1968), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 982. The Court of Appeals stated that "the trend of authority makes it clear that the variation in amounts of retirement benefits based upon differences in the attributes of men and women is constitutionally valid." The Court also stated:

There is here a reasonable relationship between the objective sought by the classification, which is to reduce the disparity between the economic and physical capabilities of a man and a woman—and the means used to achieve that objective in affording to women more favorable benefit computations. There is, moreover, nothing arbitrary or unreasonable about the application of the principle underlying the statutory differences in the computations for men and women. Notwithstanding the favorable treatment granted to women in computing their benefits, the average monthly payments to men retiring at age 62 still exceeds those awarded women retiring at that age. 390 F. 2d at 592. (emphasis supplied)

In a case involving a violation of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, the defendant raised the issue of sex discrimination, charging that since men but not women are compelled to serve in the Armed Forces, his rights to due process of law under the Fifth Amendment were violated. United States v. St. Clair, 291 F. Supp. 122 (S.D. N. Y., 1968). The Court stated:

In the Act and its predecessors, Congress made a legislative judgment that men should be subject to involuntary induction but that women, presumably because they are "still regarded as the center of home and family life" (Hoyt v State of Florida, . . .), should not. Women may constitutionally be afforded "special recognition" (cf. Gruenwald v. Gardner, . . .) particularly since women are not excluded from service in the Armed Forces.

In providing for involuntary service for men and voluntary service for women, Congress followed the teachings of history that if a nation is to survive, men must provide the first line of defense while women keep the home fires burning. 291 F. Supp. at 124–5. (Emphasis supplied)

In two recent cases, women sought to enjoin State officials from enforcing special restrictions on the hours of work of women on the ground that such laws violate their rights to due process and equal protection of the law under the Fourteenth Amendment. The three-judge Federal courts (convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 2281, 2284) held that the constitutional issue was insubstantial and that the three-judge court lacked jurisdiction.[17] The women argued that because of the State restrictive laws, they were deprived of opportunities for better paying jobs and overtime pay.

The President's Commission on the Status of Women stated in its 1963 report, American Women, that it was convinced that the U.S. Constitution now embodies equality of rights for men and women. . . . But judicial clarification is imperative in order that remaining ambiguities with respect to the constitutional protection of women's rights be eliminated. Early and definitive court pronouncement, particularly by the U.S. Supreme Court, is urgently needed with regard to the validity under the 5th and 14th amendments of laws and official practices discriminating against women, to the end that the principle of equality become firmly established in constitutional doctrine. (GPO, page 45).

The position of women under the Constitution remains ambiguous in 1970.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT AND EXISTING CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

It is, of course, possible that the 5th and 14th amendments will in the future be interpreted by the courts as prohibiting all sex distinctions in the law. Nothing in the proposed equal rights amendment would preclude this from occurring; the amendment would in no way cut back, modify, or qualify any protection against discrimination based on sex which may be afforded by the 5th and 14th amendments. As pointed out in Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (5th Edit. §§ 1938, 1939):

The securities of individual rights, it has often been observed, cannot be too frequently declared, nor in too many forms of words; nor is it possible to guard too vigilantly against the encroachments of power, nor to watch with too lively a suspicion the propensity of persons in authority to break through the "cobweb chains of paper constitution." . . .

Conceding, therefore, that if correctly construed, and applied according to their true intent and meaning, other constitutional provisions, State and national, might afford ample security for individual rights, we may nevertheless pardon the anxiety for further prohibitions, and concede that, even if wholly needless, the repetition of such securities may well be excused so long as the slightest doubt of their having been already sufficiently declared shall anywhere be found to exist.

The proposed amendment would secure the right of all persons to equal treatment under the law without any distinction as to sex. If the protection against sex discrimination provided by the equal rights amendment should prove to be duplicative of protections afforded by enlightened interpretations of the 5th and 14th amendments, no harm would be done.

Supporters of the equal rights amendment believe that the potential of the 14th amendment is too unclear and that women's constitutional rights to equality are too insecure to rely evclusively on the possibility of getting more enlightened court decisions under that amendment.

In a 1963 case, the Supreme Court stated: "The Fifteenth Amendment prohibits a State from denying or abridging a Negro's right to vote. The Nineteenth Amendment does the same for women. . . . Once a geographical unit for which a representative is to be chosen is designated, all who participate in the election are to have an equal vote—whatever their race, whatever their sex. . . . This is required by the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, 379."

This interpretation of the 14th amendment reinforced and made doubly secure the right to vote. There are numerous cases in which the Supreme Court has interpreted the 14th amendment to reinforce or to extend rights guaranteed by earlier or, as in the above case, later amendments to the Constitution. For example, the more general due process and equal protection concepts of the 5th and 14th amendments have been used to strengthen more specific rights of individuals to freedom of speech, assembly and religion guaranteed by the First Amendment; and the right to a speedy trial and the right to counsel guaranteed by the Sixth.

If the equal rights amendment is adopted, the courts might well subsequently interpret the Fourteenth Amendment as reinforcing constitutional equality for women. Certainly this possibility does not justify further delay in approving the amendment.

EFFECT THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT WOULD HAVE ON LAWS DIFFERENTIATING ON THE BASIS OF SEX

Constitutional amendments, like statutes, are interpreted by the courts in the light of intent of Congress. Committee reports on a proposal are regarded by the courts as the most persuasive evidence of the intended meaning of a provision. Therefore, the probable meaning and effect of the equal rights amendment can be ascertained from the Senate Judiciary Committee reports (which have been the same in recent years):

1. The amendment would restrict only governmental action, and would not apply to purely private action. What constitutes "State action" would be the same as under the 14th amendment and as developed in 14th amendment litigation on other subjects.

2. Special restrictions on property rights of married women would be unconstitutional; married women could engage in business as freely as a member of the male sex; inheritance rights of widows would be same as for widowers.

3. Women would be equally subject to jury service and to military service, but women would not be required to serve (in the Armed Forces) where they are not fitted any more than men are required to so serve.

4. Restrictive work laws for women only would be unconstitutional (e.g. maximum hours, night work and weight-lifting restrictions on women).

5. Alimony laws would not favor women solely because of their sex, but a divorce decree could award support to a mother if she was granted custody of the children. Matters concerning custody and support of children would be determined in accordance with the welfare of the children and without favoring either parent because of sex.

6. Laws granting maternity benefits to mothers would not be affected by the amendment, nor would criminal laws governing sexual offenses become unconstitutional (e.g. rape, prostitution).

Although the proposed amendment would specifically authorize the Congress and the States to enact implementing legislation, the amendment would be largely self-operative. The amendment is patterned after the 15th and 19th amendments, which required equal voting rights for Negroes and women, respectively. The 15th and 19th amendments did not render unconstitutional all State voting laws; they simply required the extension of voting rights to Negroes and women. The equal rights amendment would simply require that men and women be treated the same under the law. In some instances, like the 15th and 19th amendments, the effect of the amendment would be to strike the words of sex identification in the law rather than render it unconstitutional, thereby extending the rights under the law to both sexes. In other cases, where the law serves only to restrict, deny or limit the freedoms or rights of one sex, such restrictions would not be extended to both sexes; the law would be rendered unconstitutional. In still other cases, the law is partially restrictive to persons of one sex in that age limitations are imposed differently on males and females.

Following is a five-point analysis of the impact the equal rights amendment will have on the various types of Federal and State laws which distinguish on the basis of sex:

1. Strike the Words of Sex Identification and Apply the Law to Both Sexes.

Where the law confers a benefit, privilege or obligation of citizenship, such would be extended to the other sex, i.e. the effect of the amendment would be to strike the words of sex identification. Thus, such laws would not be rendered unconstitutional but would be extended to apply to both sexes by operation of the amendment, in the same way that laws pertaining to voting were extended to Negroes and women under the 15th and 19th amendments.

Examples of such laws include: laws which permit alimony to be awarded under certain circumstances to wives but not to husbands; social security and other social benefits legislation which give greater benefits to one sex than the other; exclusion of women from the requirements of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967 (i.e., women would be equally subject to military conscription).

Any expression of preference in the law for the mother in child custody cases would be extended to both parents (as against claims of third parties). Children are entitled to support from both parents under the existing laws of most States.[18] Child support laws would be affected only if they discriminate on the basis of sex. The amendment would not prohibit the requiring of one parent to provide financial support for children who are in the custody of the other.

2. Laws Rendered Unconstitutional by the Amendment.

Where a law restricts or denies opportunities of women or men, as the case may be, the effect of the equal rights amendment would be to render such laws unconstitutional.

Examples are: the exclusion of women from State universities or other public schools; State laws placing special restrictions on the hours of work for women or the weights women may lift on the job; laws prohibiting women from working in certain occupations, such as bartenders; laws placing special restrictions on the legal capacity of married women, such as making contracts or establishing a legal domicile.

3. Removal of Age Distinctions Based on Sex.

Some laws which apply to both sexes make an age distinction by sex and thereby discriminate as to persons between the ages specified for males and females. Under the foregoing analysis, the ages specified in such laws would be equalized by the amendment by extending the benefits, privileges or opportunities under the law to both sexes. This would mean that as to some such laws, the lower age would apply to both sexes. For example: a lower minimum age for marriage for women would apply to both sexes; a lower age for boys under child labor laws would apply to girls as well. In other words, the privileges of marrying or working would be extended and the sex discrimination removed.

As to other laws, the higher age would apply to both sexes. For example: a higher cut-off age for the right to paternal support for boys would apply to girls as well; a higher age for girls for juvenile court jurisdiction would apply also to boys. In these cases, the benefits of paternal support or juvenile court jurisdiction would be extended to both sexes.

Thus, the test in determining whether these laws are to be equalized by applying the lower age or by applying the higher age to both sexes is as follows:

If the age limitation restricts individual liberty and freedom the lower age applies; if the age limitation confers a right, benefit or privilege to the individuals concerned and does not limit individual freedom, the higher age applies.

4. Laws Which Could Not Possibly Apply to Both Sexes Because of the Difference in Reproductive Capacity.

Laws which, as a practical matter, can apply to only one sex no matter how they are phrased, such as laws providing maternity benefits and laws prohibiting rape, would not be affected by the amendment. The extension of these laws to both sexes would be purely academic, since such laws would not apply differently if they were phrased in terms of both sexes. In these situations, the terminology of sex identification is of no consequence.[19]

5. Separation of the Sexes.

Separation of the sexes by law would be forbidden under the amendment except in situations where the separation is shown to be necessary because of an overriding and compelling public interest and does not deny individual rights and liberties.

For example, in our present culture the recognition of the right to privacy would justify separate restroom facilities in public buildings.

As shown above, the amendment would not change the substance of existing laws, except that those which restrict and deny opportunities to women would be rendered unconstitutional under the standard of point two of the analysis. In all other cases, the laws presently on the books would simply be equalized, and this includes the entire body of family law. Moreover, the amendment in no way would restrict the State legislature or the Congress in enacting legislation on any subject, since its only purpose and effect is to prohibit any distinction based on sex classification.

OBJECTIONS TO THE PROPOSED EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Objection. The equal rights amendment is not needed because women already have equal rights under the 5th and 14th amendments.

Answer. The extent to which women may invoke the protection of the due process and equal protection guarantees of the 5th and 14th amendments is unclear. In fact, some recent court decisions have upheld sex distinctions in the law, in spite of these constitutional provisions. Even if the 5th and 14th amendments are in future cases construed so as to eliminate all sex distinctions in the law, the equal rights amendment would simply make the individual's right to equal treatment doubly secure.

Objection. If the amendment were adopted the courts would be flooded with litigation because the meaning of the amendment is not clear; e.g., what are the various "rights" that would be protected? What does "equality" mean?

Answer. The equal rights amendment would not cause excessive litigation unless there were massive resistance to compliance with the amendment's requirement of equal treatment of men and women. If that happened, it would only prove the great need for the amendment. The "right" protected by the amendment is the right to equal treatment under the law, whatever the subject of the law may be, without distinction based on sex.

Objection. The amendment would render unconstitutional a wide variety of State laws which now treat men and women differently.

Answer. Some State laws—those which deny rights or restrict freedoms of one sex—would be violative of the equal rights amendment and rendered unconstitutional. Laws which confer rights, benefits and privileges on one sex would have to apply to both sexes equally, but would not be rendered unconstitutional by the amendment.

Objection. The amendment would require sweeping changes in laws pertaining to the family.

Answer. The amendment would simply require equality. In States where the law provides for alimony only for wives, courts could award alimony to husbands as well, under the same conditions as apply with respect to wives. (More than ⅓ of the States now permit alimony to be awarded to either spouse.) Mothers and fathers would both be legally responsible for the support of their children, as is generally the case under existing law.

Objection. The amendment would nullify special State protective labor laws for women, such as those governing limitations on hours of work, weightlifting on the job, and prohibitions against night work, for women employees only.

Answer. This issue is fast becoming moot, because the Federal law (Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964) prohibits sex discrimination in employment and requires employers covered by the Act to treat men and women equally. A number of States have already conceded that special restrictions on women may no longer be enforced.

Objection. Women would be equally subject to the draft.

Answer. This is true. Women do serve in the Armed Forces now, but on a volunteer basis. The amendment would also prohibit more stringent eligibility standards for women than for men volunteers.

Objection. The equal rights amendment would require equal rights and responsibilities for women under the law.

Answer. True.

EXECUTIVE ORDER 11126—ESTABLISHING A COMMITTEE AND A COUNCIL RELATING TO THE STATUS OF WOMEN

The President's Commission on the Status of Women, established by Executive Order No. 10980 of December 14, 1961, has in fulfillment of its responsibilities, submitted a report concerning the steps that should be taken to further the effort to achieve the full participation of women in American life.

Enhancement of the quality of American leife, as envisioned by the Commission's report can be accomplished only through concerted action by both public and private groups, through coordinated action within the Federal Government, and through action by States, communities, educational institutions, voluntary organizations, employers, unions, and individual citizens.

In order to assure effective and continuing leadership in advancing the status of women, it is deemed appropriate to establish an interdepartmental committee and a citizens' advisory council on the status of women.

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States, it is ordered as follows:

PART I.—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Section 101(a) There is hereby established the Interdepartmental Committee on the Status of Women (hereinafter referred to as the "Committee"), which shall be composed of the Secretary of Labor, who shall be the Chairman of the Committee, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, and an Assistant Secretary of Labor to be designated by the Secretary of Labor, all ex officio. The Chairman may designate a Vice-Chairman of the Committee from its membership, and the Director of the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor shall serve as Executive Vice-Chairman of the Committee, and shall be an ex officio member thereof.[1]

(b) When any matter especially related to the area of responsibility of any Federal Department or agency, the head of which is not a member of the Committee, is to be considered by the Committee, the Chairman of the Committee shall invite the head of such department or agency to participate in the deliberations of the Committee with respect to such matter and to be a temporary member of the Committee during such deliberations.

Sec. 102. The Committee shall—

(1) Maintain a continuing review and evaluation of the progress of Federal departments and agencies in advancing the status of women.

(2) Serve as a clearing house for information as to the activities being directed toward, and the progress being made in, improving conditions of special interest to women.

(3) Stimulate cooperation and the sharing of data, views, and information among Federal agencies, State and local governments, State commissions on the status of women, and public and private organizations having responsibilities and interests in areas of special concern to women.

(4) Encourage research on factors affecting the status of women in the areas of education, home and community activities, employment, social insurance, taxes, civil and political rights, labor legislation, and related matters.

(5) Exchange information with the Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women, established by Part II of this order, on progress toward advancing the status of women and on new developments requiring consideration by the Council and the Committee.

Sec. 103. Annually the Committee, after consultation with the Citizens' Advisory Council, shall transmit a report to the President concerning the status of women.[1]

PART II—CITIZEN'S ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Sec. 201. There is hereby established the Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women (hereinafter referred to as the "Council"), which shall be composed of 20 members appointed by the President, one of whom he shall designate to serve as Chairman. The Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman of the Committee, but not less than twice a year. Members of the Council shall serve without compensation from the United States.[1]

Sec. 202. The Council shall—

(1) Serve as a primary means for suggesting and stimulating action with private institutions, organizations, and individuals working for improvement of conditions of special concern to women.

(2) Review and evaluate progress of organizations in furthering the full participation of women in American life.

(3) Advise and assist the Committee in the evaluation of total progress made and recommended to the Committee, as necessary, action to accelerate such progress.

(4) Consider the effect of new developments on methods of advancing the status of women and recommend appropriate action to the Committee.

PART III.—FINANCING AND ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 301. The departments the heads of which are, under Section 101(a) of this order, members of the Committee and the Civil Service Commission shall, as may be necessary, furnish assistance to the Committee in accordance with Section 214 of the Act of May 3, 1945, 59 Stat. 134 (31 U.S.C. 691). To the extent practical and not inconsistent with the law, (1) all Federal departments and agencies shall cooperate with the Committee and the Council and furnish them such information and assistance as may be necessary for the performance of their functions, and (2) the Secretary of Labor shall furnish staff, office space, office facilities and supplies and other necessary assistance, facilities, and services for the Committee and Council (including travel expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence for members of the Council).

COLLISION WARNING

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, on January 8, 1960, two F–101B's collided approximately 60 miles from Lambert-St. Louis Airport under positive radar control. Both planes were lost, and two crew members killed. This incident sparked the McDonnell Douglas investigation of collision avoidance, which gave birth to the time resynchronization technology called EROS. EROS is an acronym that stands for "eliminate range zero system," for if range zero is eliminated, no collision can occur.

The McDonnell Douglas investigation followed the now traditional path of a detailed investigation. In a 2-year study, it was determined that none of the previous air safety devices provided the needed protection necessary to handle aircraft over a wide velocity spectrum and in all attitude maneuvering flight.

More recently the examination of this technology has led to a realization, that the same signal structure that provides collision avoidance warning, can also be used as a powerful tool to aid air traffic control.

Earlier this year I entered into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article honoring Mr. Frank C. White or as he is known in the trade, "Mr. Collision Avoidance." Today, I am entering an article by Mr. Joe Dobronski, chief test pilot for the McDonnell Douglas Corp. His article clearly explains the current technology of collision avoidance systems, and points to the urgent need for every aircraft to have such equipment. I am grateful to Mr. Dale May, one of the Nation's top spokesmen for general aviation, for calling this article to my attention.

Since coming to Congress in 1959, I have advocated such equipment be mandatory on all aircraft. Coverage for the entire United States is estimated to cost about $80 million. I urge all my colleagues to read this article very carefully and weigh the benefits and safety factors we are unmindful of. The article follows:

COLLISION WARNING

(By Joe Dobronski)

The test run began at 45,000 feet above the Missouri-Arkansas border. I had just pushed our F–4 Phantom to more than 1000 mph, and the foothills of the Ozarks were sweeping beneath our wings at nearly 20 miles a minute.

Ahead of us, another supersonic Phantom was closing straight for a tiny point in the sky—a spot we both would soon occupy at the same time.

The miles between us were dropping away so fast that I would be unable to identify the approaching speck on the windscreen before it became distressingly huge. The final mile would close in barely more than a second, and we would not see each other in time to take evasive action. Nor would we be warned from the ground.

But we would not collide.

A new concept in airborne collision avoidance was about to receive one of its toughest tests, a head-on pass at supersonic speeds. A slim package of electronic circuitry in the missile well of our airplane was sending and receiving precisely-timed signals that would allow detection of the imminent crash when the two planes were still 35 miles apart—or 60 seconds before we would fly to destruction.

As we held our course and speed, a rasping tone in the headset sounded the warning. On my instrument panel an arrow popped into view. "Fly up", it said. At the same instant an arrow was appearing in the cockpit of the other fighter miles away. "Fly down", it said. Seconds later he saw the sun glint for an instant on the wings of the other half of our potential catastrophe as it passed 1000 feet below.

This mid-air crash was averted by a new collision avoidance system, EROS, since proven on more than 14,000 operational flights. Configured to airline requirements, it may one day soon protect air travellers everywhere.

A CONDITION IN COMMON

The concept demonstrated above the Ozarks was developed as a result of a mid-air crash of two of our supersonic F–101 Voodoos in 1960. We studied backwards from the instant of contact, looking into every possibility for avoiding the accident. We compared it with other recorded mid-air crashes. And we found that, no matter what other circumstances exist, all air collisions have one obvious condition in common. The range between two colliding aircraft eventually closes to zero.

The name and purpose of the new device had emerged: "Eliminate Range O System"—EROS. In pursuit of this goal, engineers at McDonnell Douglas faced a challenge that had frustrated researchers in a score of companies for over a decade. The solution, easier to hypothesise than to achieve, was to avoid range zero by finding a way to measure the range and closing rate between aircraft.

If you know that an aircraft is 20 miles away and you are closing at 20 miles a minute, then you have 60 seconds to react, to maneuver your aircraft out of harm's way. But there was no existing way to determine range and closing rate for a large number of aircraft, all climbing, descending, maneuvering and speeding through a given airspace—at least not with an airborne system smaller than house-sized proportions. The necessity was to find a means for literally hundreds of aircraft to communicate with one another without interference.

The eventual solution was to develop a new technique, now known as "resynchronisation". In simple terms, it precisely divides the few seconds available for solving the collision avoidance problem. Inexpensive, lightweight, airborne clocks (crystal oscillators) are reset every three seconds by a signal from a ground station master clock. This maintains a time reference accurate to 0.0000002 of a second in each aircraft. The continuously synchronised clocks make it possible to allocate time periods, or "message slots," to EROS-equipped aircraft.

A TIME TO TALK AND A TIME TO LISTEN

Each aircraft is assigned a message slot: a time to talk. When the onboard clock reaches the assigned time period for broadcast, the EROS system transmits a signal that includes its identification and altitude.

All other EROS system listen. By measuring the delay between the instant transmission starts and the instant it is received, each EROS set can determine the range between itself and the transmitting aircraft.

In addition, because of Doppler effect, the radio frequency of the signal received changes according to the relative speed between the two aircraft. From this change, EROS logic can determine the time to closest approach, by electronically dividing the range by the range rate. When the flight paths become threatening, the system issues a warning. With the commercial EROS system installed, 2000 aircraft with a 140-mile radius could accomplish all of this communication, interpretation, and presentation every three seconds.

Admittedly, collisions could still occur between aircraft approaching each other at speeds too slow for the Doppler shift to be discernible. (The 1956 Grand Canyon collision between two airliners was at such gradual closing rates.) Consequently, the system warns of aircraft flying at the same altitude and within 1½ miles, regardless of the closing rate.

PROTECTION EVEN WHILE MANEUVERING

Altitude information coded in the incoming EROS signal is compared electronically with the altitude and rate-of-climb or descent in the receiving aircraft. If the comparison finds the paths of two aircraft crossing at the same altitude, a collision situation exists. The warning is sounded. But it doesn't help a pilot to find out he's in trouble if you don't tell him what to do. EROS does.

A buzzer—a loud one—tells him to look at his collision avoidance instrument. Lighted arrows tell him to fly up or fly down. In heavy traffic, where other aircraft occupy altitudes above and below, the instrument will direct a relatively small climb or dive to avoid the collision without disrupting other air traffic.

EROS is a "real time" device. That means it does not store or retrieve information. Its computations are fairly simple. All information needed to avoid a collision is evaluated once every three seconds. Information presented three seconds later is completely new and current.

It is "real time" in another sense. It is not a system dependent on new technological breakthroughs or a long development cycle. EROS, with 14,000 flights behind it, is a proven concept, a proven system, ready to enter quantity production. The system, electronically configured to airline requirements, has been studied and operationally tested by the Air Transport Association. The test programme, in which the McDonnell Douglas system and precise time-base CAS systems of two other manufacturers were evaluated, was sponsored, by a number of major US air carriers and included FAA paticipation.

WHY CAN'T WE HAVE IT NOW?

Various reasons for delaying the system's introduction are cited, but none of them convincing from a pilot's—or passenger's—point of view.

Naturally, there's concern about the cost of CAS equipment, a totally new installation serving chiefly as an adjunct to existing air traffic control systems. But such back-up systems are more common than not on airlines, and EROS also offers system growth potential beyond its basic collision avoidance role.

To extend the EROS system to smaller aircraft also requires a national network of ground stations. These would necessarily number in the hundreds, as compared to the handful needed for airlines (whose more sophisticated airborne equipment requires far fewer ground references). However, the equipment is already developed, and coverage for the entire US is estimated to cost about $80 million—which is hardly prohibitive when measured against the safety benefits offered.

The light plane operator is justifiably concerned about the cost of an airborne system frequently greater than his airplane. Under a contract with NASA's Electronic Research Center, McDonnell Douglas engineers are defining an EROS derivative system of a size, weight and price for the private and business market. This is a necessity; for without equipment on these aircraft, the safety advantages of EROS are denied to this major segment of the flying public, and the safety of the system serving the airlines is compromised. Big and small, all planes need collision protection and we're working to provide it.

The history of electronic system progress is promising. It is characteristic for such systems to drop sharply in price as they are introduced. VHF communication systems, when first developed in the late '40s, were limited in performance and as costly in the dollars of the day as is today's EROS. Yet now, tens of thousands of small aircraft operate quite successfully with lightweight VHF radios costing less than $500 and with a performance 100 times greater than the first sets introduced.

EROS AUGMENTS PRESENT SYSTEM

The EROS system works well with current air traffic control, providing a direct cockpit-to-cockpit backup to existing systems. Moreover, it has the seeds of growth and improvement necessary to accommodate increased air traffic in the decades ahead.

The heart of EROS, the precise time base, conserves radio frequencies. We've developed techniques to use the collision avoidance signal for communication, navigation, and identification, plus station-keeping on other aircraft. The time-frequency concepts of EROS can increase the amount and accuracy of information available to ground controllers. EROS reduces the air-to-ground communication burden, and permits a significant reduction in the airspace allotted to individual aircraft—effectively creating more room for everyone to fly.

I'm frequently asked why a company known for building large jetliners and high performance fighters got into a system like EROS.

In the early '60s, we were facing very high production schedules in our own Phantom programmes. The situation virtually demanded that we add some form of collision protection to our aircraft to achieve our flight test goals. Otherwise, we would become an excessive burden on air traffic controllers, and at our airspeeds we would require an inordinate amount of airspace in which to fly. The answer was EROS.

Today we consider it a requirement. We don't go up without it. And as far as airline operations are concerned, we feel we've discovered a genuine means for safer, more dependable transportation.

THE NATIONAL METROPOLITAN DEVELOPMENT BANK, H.R. 16448

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, new procendures are needed to amass credit to build the vast amount of community facilities required in the coming years. H.R. 16448, the Metro Bank Act, does that job.

One estimate of the expenditure needed to replace obsolete facilities, reduce backlogs and provide for an expanding population is $625 billion by 1978. The Institute of Public Administration places a $6 trillion price tag on housing and community facilities up to the end of the century.

Local governments traditionally have borne the burden of providing public capital projects—the infrastructure of community growth—by borrowing up to half the funds through local bond issues. This method of obtaining credit is preferred by many local governments and nothing proposed here diminishes their right or ability to use bond issues whenever they desire. This proposal provides an alternative method for local governments to borrow money—an alternative source of credit. It provides the opportunity to avoid some of the more cumbersome, expensive, and time consuming procedures of issuing bonds, and holds the promise that interest charges can be reduced.

This proposal recommends the creation of a National Metropolitan Development Bank with metropolitan subsidiaries that will issue bonds and debentures on the national investment market and relend these funds to local communities at rates from 30 to 50 percent below the prevailing rates on its bonds. The bank would be authorized to make long-term—40- to 60-year—low-interest loans for building basic community facilities but it would also be able to finance low income housing and community medical facilities and other projects which are, by their nature, public facilities. And equally important, the bank would be able to make soft loans for up to 20 years for economic development, if an area is classified as low income, or depressed, or where an increase in investment is declared to be in the national interest. Such a declaration for the soft loans would come from the Council of Economic Advisers acting upon the advice of the various departments which have expertise in assessing economic conditions.

The Federal Government would pay the difference between the interest rates of the loans and the bonds in annual appropriations. This amount would not be a net budget cost because national bank bondholders would pay Federal taxes on interest income.

The bank would be capitalized at $6 billion. One-half would be borrowed from the U.S. Treasury over a 10-year period. The other $3 billion would be raised by the sale of common stock. Each borrower would be required to purchase a portion of this stock based on the number of people within its jurisdiction, or on some other relevant criteria.

The bank would be chartered by special act of Congress but it would not be a Federal agency. It would work closely with the Federal Government. Representatives of Federal agencies and departments would serve on the board of directors.

Metropolitan areas that are large enough to generate a level of activity sufficient to support the operation of a subsidiary will be serviced through metropolitan branches. The balance of the bank's activities will be available through regional divisions each of which would have an advisory committee representing governments and borrowers within the region. The regional staffs would be expected to develop expertise in regional affairs, city and community problems, and Federal regional policies and practices.

Almost as important as its money-lending function would be the bank's function as expert and information sources on both Federal programs including funding levels and availability of funds—and specific metropolitan area problems. This position would enable the bank to coordinate not only Federal programs but the activities of local units of government as well. There is no greater need in America today than to find a mechanism to coordinate the vast number of Federal programs with the vast number of local governments that use the programs.

The National Metropolitan Development Bank also provides an opportunity to adopt sensible procedures in funding projects at the Federal level. At the present time, if the Federal support for a particular facility is 50 percent, then 50 percent of the entire cost must be appropriated in a single year. Under annual contributions only 50 percent of the annual payment due would be appropriated in a single year. This procedure allows more projects for building facilities to be started rapidly rather than spacing starts randomly over a long period of time according to the vagaries of congressional appropriations. The consequence is that our air and water would be cleaner sooner.

Heretofore, local governments opposed this plan because they would have had to issue two kinds of bonds—one for their share and one for the Federal share—and finance the Federal share—artifically inflating local debt probably beyond the statutory limit—even though each year the Federal Government would pay a proportion of the annual payment.

The Metro Bank Act removes this objection by having the Metro Bank lend money to a local government to cover the entire cost of the project, accepting a note from them for only their share. The balance would be secured by a commitment of the Federal Government—a power the bank would be given in its charter from Congress.

The Metropolitan Development Bank as proposed here not only provides a wholly new alternative that local governments can use in financing facilities but it also opens up the possibility of new approaches for the Federal Government to increase the number of facilities it can support for local government.

The text of H.R. 16448 follows:

H.R. 16448

A bill to establish a National Metropolitan Development Bank to provide an alternative source of credit to State and local governments for the purpose of financing public and quasi-public facilities of all types, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Metropolitan Development Bank Act of 1970".

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) (1) The Congress hereby finds and declares that population increases and rising demands for a safe and prosperous life have created an unprecedented demand for (A) basic community facilities, such as streets, schools, hospitals, housing, water and sewer facilities, waste disposal, mass transit, and parks and playgrounds, and (B) economic development in urban ghettos, disaster areas, and labor surplus areas, as well as in new towns and new cities.

(2) The Congress further finds that the existing institutional structure for providing funds—the municipal bond-Federal grant arrangement—cannot provide at reasonable cost the amounts necessary to satisfy these growing demands. The financial needs of our growing communities require the full mobilization of skills and resources in all levels of government, Federal, State, and local, as well as in the private sector.

(3) The Congress further finds that the most effective use of funds can only be made when information and technical expertise regarding engineering requirements, financial and economic factors, Federal programs and funding levels, and comprehensive area problems and planning are readily available at a single source.

(b) The purpose of this Act is to establish a National Metropolitan Development Bank system that will provide an alternative source of funds for community facilities and economic development, that will involve national investment markets and all groups of investors, and that will provide information to coordinate Federal, State, and local programs with local problems and governments.

CREATION OF BANK

SEC. 3. There is hereby created a body corporate to be known as the National Metropolitan Development Bank, which shall have succession until dissolved by Act of Congress. The bank, which shall not be an agency of the United States Government, shall maintain such offices as may be necessary or appropriate in the conduct of its business.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

SEC. 4. (a) The bank shall have a board of directors which shall consist of fifteen members to be appointed by the President as follows: One member appointed by the President of the United States from the Federal Reserve System; four members appointed by the President from among the heads of the departments and principal agencies of the executive branch of the Government; two members who are Governors of States, selected from among nominees to be presented by the National Governors' Conference; two members who are elected officials of city government, selected from among nominees to be presented by the National League of Cities; two members who are elected officials of county government, selected from among nominees to be presented by the National Association of County Officials; and four members who are representatives of the general public, one of whom shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall serve as president of the bank and chairman of the board.

(b) Those directors who are appointed by the President of the United States shall serve at the pleasure of the President and until their successors have been appointed and have qualified. Except as provided in section 5, the remaining directors shall be elected by the stockholders for terms of two years, staggered so that one-half shall be elected annually. Elective seats on the board which become vacant during their term shall be filled by the board, but only for the unexpired portion of the term. Any director who is a full-time officer or employee of the United States shall not receive compensation for his services as director.

(c) The board shall meet at the call of its chairman, who shall require it to meet not less often than once every two months.

(d) Subject to the general policies of the board, the management of the bank shall be vested in the president and he shall be the chief executive officer of the bank.

APPOINTMENT OF INITIAL BOARD OF DIRECTORS

SEC. 5. The initial members of the board shall all be appointed by the President (with those members who under section 4 are to be nominated by the National Governors' Conference, the National League of Cities, and the National Association of County Officials and elected by the stockholders being appointed from amongst the nominees presented by those organizations). The members who under section 4 are to stand for election but who under this section are initially appointed by the President shall serve until the second annual meeting of stockholders following the date of the first sale of the bank's stock at which time the remaining board members shall designate which of the members then elected shall serve for one year and which shall serve for two years so that thereafter the terms of the elected board members shall be staggered.

INITIAL EXPENSES

SEC. 6. In order to facilitate the formation of the bank, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay initial organizing and operating expenses. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated a sum not to exceed $500,000 for this purpose.

AUTHORITY

SEC. 7. (a) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the bank is authorized—

(1) to make commitments to purchase, and to purcahse, service, and sell, on terms and conditions determined by the bank, any obligation (or participation therein) of a State or local government issued wholly or partly to finance the construction of basic community facilities or public works of any type;

(2) to make or guarantee loans to State and local governments to finance the construction of basic community facilities and public works of all types (including loans to nonprofit or quasi-governmental organizations and entities to finance the construction of housing, medical facilities, and other facilities which are supported by Federal or State programs and are determined by the bank to have the attributes of public facilities); and

(3) to make loans for the purpose of facilitating economic development in geographical areas designated by the Council of Economic Advisers as being low income, depressed, or labor surplus areas, disaster areas, or areas in need of direct investment to further the national public interest or other special help to stimulate economic activities within those areas.

(b) The bank shall develop criteria to assure that projects assisted by it are not inconsistent with comprehensive planning for the development of the communities in which they will be located or disruptive of Federal programs which authorize assistance for the development of like or similar categories of projects.

(c) A loan made under this section may not exceed the total capital cost of the project to be financed, and shall be made for a term determined by the bank; except that the term of a loan made under paragraph (2) of subsection (a) shall not exceed the life of the project or sixty years, whichever is less, and the term of a loan made under paragraph (3) of subsection (a) to a private person for a project consisting primarily of profitmaking facilities shall not exceed twenty years.

(d) All obligations purchased and loans made pursuant to this section shall bear interest at a rate determined by the bank which shall be low enough to be competitive with municipal bonds.

(e) In any case in which the bank undertakes to provide assistance to a State or local government under subsection (a) for the construction of a project for which a department or agency of the Federal Government (under another law of the United States) will also provide funds—

(1) the assistance provided by the bank under subsection (a) may be in the full amount needed by the State or local government to finance such construction (including the amount of the funds which will be provided by such department or agency), with the funds to be provided by such department or agency with respect to such construction thereupon becoming payable (notwithstanding any contrary provision in the law under which they are payable) to the bank in lieu of being paid directly to such government, and

(2) the bank may accept in return (A) an obligation or obligations of such State or local government covering only the difference between such full amount and the amount of the funds which are payable with respect to such construction by such department or agency, plus (B) a commitment from such department or agency to pay the funds which are to be provided by it and are payable to the bank as described in paragraph (1), in order to insure that such State or local government will not have to include within its debt limit that portion of the indebtedness incurred for the financing of such construction which is attributable to funds provided by the Federal Government.

(f)(1) The bank is authorized to charter a subsidiary metropolitan development bank to operate in any metropolitan area upon a determination by the board that the amount of borrowing and lending activity in such area is sufficiently large to support a full financial and technical staff. Each subsidiary metropolitan development bank shall be chartered for the smallest possible geographical area consistent with the required level of activity, to insure that it will reffect local problems and issues in its loan priorities and its technical and advisory services.

(2) Each subsidiary metropolitan development bank shall be authorized—

(A) to borrow funds from the bank;

(B) within its area of charter—

(i) to make loans to State and local governments, community nonprofit groups, and area development corporations to assist in financing the construction of public facilities, with the same maturities and interest rates as those prescribed by subsections (c) and (d) for loans made by the bank under subsection (a) (1) and (2); and

(ii) to make loans to individuals, quasi-public corporations, and business and commercial development concerns operating in the area of charter if such area or the part of such area within which they are operating is certified by the Council of Economic Advisers as a low income, depressed, or labor surplus area, a disaster area, or a new community requiring direct investment to further the public interest, with maturities of not more than twenty years and interest rates fixed at levels which will stimulate economic development but without being otherwise restricted by conventional lending practices or prevailing interest rates;

(C) to obtain certifications from the Council of Economic Advisers with respect to whether a particular area or part thereof is an area described in subparagraph (B) (ii); and

(D) to maintain a staff of financial, technical, and management personnel which is comparable to the staff maintained by the bank and which will provide information and assistance in planning and constructing public facilities and in aiding economic planning and activities.

To the extent permitted by its charter from the bank and not inconsistent with this subsection or with other provisions of this Act, each subsidiary metropolitan development bank shall have (with respect to the area in which it operates) the same functions, powers, and authorities as those vested in the bank by this Act.

(3) Each subsidiary metropolitan development bank shall have a board of directors elected by the holders of the bank's class B stock denominated for that particular bank. Such board shall consist of seven members, one representing local governments, one representing metropolitan councils or planning organizations, and the remainder broadly representative of economic and social groups within the area involved.

(4) The earnings of the subsidiary metropolitan development banks shall be applied to restore any impairment of capital, make up any losses in reserves, create and maintain a reserve account for bad debts, and purchase stock in the bank.

(5) Each subsidiary metropolitan development bank shall make an annual report to the bank and submit to an annual audit by the bank. At regular intervals each such bank shall be audited by the General Accounting Office in the same manner as is provided (with respect to the bank) in section 16.

(g) Except as otherwise specifically provided in this Act, the bank may impose charges or fees for its services with the objective that all costs and expenses of its operations should be within its income derived from such operations.

REGIONAL OPERATING DIVISIONS

SEC. 8. (a) The bank shall establish regional operating divisions. Each division (subject to the exception in subsection (b)) shall be charged with responsibility for assessing borrower eligibility, making loans, and supplying technical and advisory personnel within its region or geographical area. To the maximum extent feasible, the boundaries of the regions or geographical areas respectively represented by the several regional operating divisions shall be the same as the boundaries of the areas respectively served by the regional offices of the various Federal departments and agencies.

(b) Each regional operating division shall transact all of the bank's business within its region, except that no such division shall exercise functions in any area for which a subsidiary metropolitan development bank has been established.

(c) Each regional operating division shall be supervised by a three member panel appointed by the board. In addition, an advisory committee of not less than eighteen nor more than twenty-five persons representing all governments and all socioeconomic levels within the division's region shall be appointed by the board to develop policies and guidelines for the division's activities.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 9. (a) The bank shall have, in addition to a staff adequately equipped in the field of development banking, personnel qualified to give advice in the following fields (and any other categories of advice appropriately related to the bank's activities):

(1) The Federal Government, particularly its organization and operation relating to State and local governments.

(2) All phases of all Federal grant-in-aid programs.

(3) Methods of administering the development and operation of community facilities.

(4) Technical data and requirements in fields appropriately related to the bank's activities, including the following:

(A) roads, hospitals, schools, and airports;

(B) urban mass transit systems and bridges;

(C) housing, municipal buildings, and parks;

(D) courthouses;

(E) water and sewage facilities and air pollution controls; and

(F) commercial developments.

(b) The bank shall give any necessary technical assistance under this section to applicants for assistance under section 7. No fees for preliminary advice shall be charged; however, after an application has been accepted for processing, the bank may charge reasonable fees for continued assistance under this subsection.

(c) The bank is also authorized to undertake research and information gathering, and to facilitate the exchange of advanced concepts and techniques relating to municipal growth and development among State and local governments.

STOCK

SEC. 10. (a) The bank shall have two classes of common stock, both of which shall have voting rights and have a par value of $100 per share. Class A stock shall be sold to investors throughout the country. Class B stock, which shall be issued by the bank to provide local investment and control in the various subsidiary metropolitan development banks established under section 7 (f) and accordingly limited to and denominated as the stock of a particular metropolitan development bank, shall be sold only within the area of charter of the named metropolitan development bank to local investors, groups, and governments. Holders of class B stock shall have all the privileges of holders of class A stock, including a vote in the election of the board, and in addition shall have the right to vote in the election of the directors of the metropolitan development bank named on the stock.

(b) All moneys received by the bank in return for its common stock shall be accumulated in a capital surplus account. All net earnings from the operations of the bank shall annually be transferred to its general surplus account. Such dividends as may be declared shall be paid by the bank to the holders of its common stock and shall be charged against the general surplus account, but in any one fiscal year dividends shall not exceed 6 per centum of the par value of the common stock issued and outstanding and shall be payable out of the net earnings of the bank for that year.

CAPITALIZATION OF THE BANK

SEC. 11. The bank's capital shall be limited to $6,000,000,000, of which $3,000,000,000 shall be raised by the sale of the bank's common stock and the remainder shall be provided as follows:

(1) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase obligations of the bank in the amount of $300,000,000 a year for a period of ten years. If the Secretary finds it is necessary for the successful operation of the bank to waive the payment of interest and principal for any given year such interest shall then be added to the principal of the obligation. The bank is authorized to include appropriate provisions in the instruments evidencing the obligations provided for in this paragraph. Each purchase of obligations by the Secretary under this paragraph shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a return at a rate not less than a rate determined by the Secretary, taking into consideration the current average yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The Secretary may sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine, any of the obligations acquired by him under this paragraph. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of such obligations under this paragraph shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

(2) The Secretary of the Treasury is additionally authorized to purchase debentures of the bank in the amount of $300,000,000 from public debt proceeds on emergency call of the bank.

(3) Each public borrower from the bank at the time of receiving loans shall be required to purchase stock until it holds an amount of stock equivalent to $2.14 per capita for each person within its jurisdiction or for each person expected to be served by the facility or facilities involved. The borrower shall purchase stock equal to one-twentieth of the amount of his loans until he reaches the $2.14 per capita maximum requirement.

(4) The amount of bank's indebtedness outstanding at any one time shall be limited to fifty times the bank's paid-in capital surplus.

OBLIGATIONS OF THE BANK

SEC. 12. The bank is authorized to issue and have outstanding obligations (including but not limited to the obligations and debentures described in section 11) having such maturities and bearing such rates of interest as may be determined by the bank. Such obligations may be redeemable at the option of the bank before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated therein.

FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO THE BANK

SEC. 13. (a) With respect to such amounts of loans of the bank as may be specified in appropriation Acts, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make, and to contract to make, annual payments to the bank in such amounts as are necessary to equal the amount by which the dollar amount of interest paid by the bank on account of its outstanding obligations exceeds the dollar amount of interest received by the bank on account of obligations purchased or loans made by it pursuant to section 7.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Treasury such sums as may be necessary to carry out his functions under this Act, including such sums as may be necessary to make the annual payments required by contracts entered into by the Secretary pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

FEDERAL INSURANCE OF OBLIGATIONS TO THE BANK

SEC. 14. (a) The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Secretary"), upon application by the bank, is authorized to insure any loan made by the bank under section 7(a) (including, for purposes of this section, any obligation purchased as provided in paragraph (1) thereof), and to issue a commitment for the insurance of any such loan prior to the date of its execution or disbursement thereon upon a determination that all of the applicable criteria established by or under this Act will be met with respect to such loan.

(b) The insurance of any loan under subsection (a) and any payments pursuant thereto shall be made on such terms and conditions, and in such manner and form, as the Secretary shall by regulations prescribe, and shall provide for the payment in full to the bank of the outstanding principal balance of the loan together with any unpaid interest, upon default by the borrower, in accordance with procedures set forth in such regulations.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to charge and collect premiums for insurance under this section. Such premiums shall be fixed at the lowest possible levels which are determined by the Secretary to be reasonable and sufficient to keep the insurance program under this section in a sound and secure condition and maintain the fund established by subsection (d) at a level adequate to meet all anticipated losses, but in any event shall be lower for loans made under paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 7(a) than for loans made under paragraph (3) of such section.

(d) (1) There is hereby established a revolving fund to be used by the Secretary in carrying out his functions under this section. All premiums charged as provided in subsection (c), and all other receipts under the insurance program, shall be deposited in the fund; and all payments with respect to insurance under this section shall be made from the fund. Moneys in the fund not needed for the payment of current operating expenses or the payment of insurance under the program may be invested in bonds or other obligations of, or bonds or other obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest by, the United States.

(2) There is authorized to be appropriated as initial capital for the revolving fund established by paragraph (1) the sum of $____.

(e) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this Act, the Secretary shall (in addition to any authority otherwise vested in him) have the functions, powers, and duties set forth in section 402 (except subsection (c) (2)) of the Housing Act of 1950.

The representatives of the General Accounting Office shall have access to all books, accounts, financial records, reports, files, and other papers things, or property belonging to or in use by the bank and necessary to facilitate the audit, and they shall be afforded full facilities for verifying transactions with the balances or securities held by depositaries, fiscal agents, and custodians.

(b) The expenses of any audit performed under this section shall be borne out of appropriations to the General Accounting Office, and appropriations in such sums as may be necessary for this purpose are authorized. A copy of each report shall be furnished to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the bank.

NOISE POLLUTION

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, the problem of incessant and excessively loud noise has often been overlooked in the battle for a better environment. Today, the public is fortunately more and more aware that "environment" is not an esoteric term referring to a distant forest dotted with numerous lakes, but rather concerns the interaction of man and his surroundings everywhere. They are realizing that our dilapidated urban areas demand imaginative and resourceful action from those who seek a cleaner and safer environment.

The problem of intolerable noise, resulting mainly from urban industry and supersonic aircraft, is fast becoming a chief concern of urban ecologists. In the Bronx the residents of many apartment houses, most notably the Parkchester apartments, are subjected daily to annoying and possibly dangerous levels of noise resulting from aircraft.

The fact that this noise has gone from a simple annoyance to a possible menace makes it all the more disturbing. Recently some scientists have discovered evidence of possible damage to unborn babies from this noise pollution. I insert the following two articles from the New York Times and the Washington Post into the RECORD:

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 29, 1969]

SOUNDS OF MODERN SOCIETY ENDANGERS ITS LISTENERS

(By Stuart Auerbach)

BOSTON, December 28.—The loud noises of modern society—from sonic booms to rock 'n' roll music—were listed today as health hazards potentially more dangerous than air or water pollution.

One scientist reported the possibility that sonic booms threaten the future health and mental stability of still unborn babies. Another said noises could cause heart attacks in people with existing cardiac conditions "by adding insult to injury." And an Australian pharmacologist noted that heavy thunderclaps made laboratory rats sick.

"We now have millions with heart disease, high blood pressure and emotional illness who need protection from the additional stress of noise," Dr. Samual Rosen of the Mt. Sinai School of Medicine in New York told a special section on noise pollution at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

He added that no one becomes indifferent to noise which inflicts "stress, tension and sometimes intolerable nervous strain. People become irritable, unsociable and more quarrelsome at work and at home.

"There seems to be little doubt that noise pollution is a health hazard," concluded Rosen, blaming loud noises for causing blood vessels to constrict, cutting the amount of blood that flows to key parts of the body.

Rabbits exposed to noise for 10 weeks showed higher levels of blood cholesterol and more clogging of the arteries than a group of rabbits not exposed to noise, he reported.

In another paper, Dr. Lester W. Sontag, director of the Fels Research Institute in Yellow Springs, Ohio, reported experiments showing that loud noises disturb unborn children in the late stages of fetal development.

He cited studies showing babies kick in their mother's womb in response to loud noises. And he said he found "a statistical relation between sudden movements before birth and "social apprehension" 2½ years later—a hesitation to join groups, for instance, and reluctance to go to nursery school.

It was enough, he said, "to justify concern about the possibility of fetal damage from such violent sounds as sonic booms."

Dr. Chauncey D. Leake of the University of California at San Francisco said that noise can affect the whole autonomic nervous system that regulates a person's blood pressure and heart beat.

It could be, Associated Press quoted Dr. Leake as saying, that stress from loud noise could affect the nervous system of a pregnant woman so that her unborn baby is affected, too, by stress chemicals of hormones that pass from her bloodstream through the placenta to the baby.)

Other evidence was offered on the adverse effects of noise to the health of humans and animals:

Dr. Francis M. Forester of the University of Wisconsin Medical Center said seizures in about one per cent of epileptics are caused by the brain's reaction to some form of noise—not always loud and sometime as innocent as a new piece of music.

Dr. Mary F. Lockett, an Australian pharmacologist, found that laboratory rats excreted abnormally high amounts of the hormone oxytocin from their pituitary gland after heavy thunderclaps. This increased the amount of water and salt in their bodies, and made them ill.

Another report estimated the noise in an average household at 40 decibels, a rock-and-roll band at 120 decibels and a jet plane at 115 decibels when it is 500 feet over an airport.

"We are constantly bombarded by noise, whether is it the background music at the supermarket or a supersonic jet breaking the sound barrier, and these increases in noise level have joined industrial wastes and the car as a major source of pollution in our environment," said Drs. Kenneth R. Henry and Robert E. Bowman of the University of Wisconsin.

"The adverse effects of noise, however, are not as readily apparent as smog or dirty water."

SCIENTIST ASSERTS VIOLENT NOISE MAY HARM BABIES BEFORE BIRTH

(By Sandra Blakeslee)

BOSTON, Dec. 28—Violent noise, such as sonic booms, may have permanently damaging effects on unborn babies, a scientist warned today.

The warning, presented to a noise pollution panel at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, was issued by Dr. Lester W. Sontag, director of the Fels Research Institute in Yellow Springs, Ohio. The paper by Dr. Sontag, who could not be present today, was read by a colleague.

Too much noise in the everyday environment—noise pollution—has been shown to cause health problems in adults. Loss of hearing, increased mental stress and heart disease have been linked to the assault of excess noise in daily living.

The human fetus, according to Dr. Sontag, is equally vulnerable to the noxious effects of too much noise. Forty years ago many people believed that the human fetus was protected from unpleasant conditions in the outside world in the comfort of the mother's womb, but recent experiments have shown that the fetus is not so isolated after all, Dr. Sontag said. The fetus seems to react to harmful environmental conditions just as the mother does, he said.

Supersonic transport jets may therefore pose a threat to the health of unborn infants in that the planes will be one more noxious addition to the total assault of an increasingly noisy environment. It is estimated that one such jet, crossing the United States, would cut a swath of noise 25 miles wide on each side, within earshot of up to 50 million people.

Experiments in recent years, Dr. Sontag said, have shown that the fetus is indeed not in a world by itself. Smoking mothers generally have smaller babies than do nonsmoking mothers. Fetal death is more common among offspring of smoking mothers.

Emotional stress in a mother can make an infant more active in late pregnancy. Severe stress can elicit up to five or six times as much activity in the fetus than is normal.

Children born by mothers suffering such excessive anxiety during pregnancy have been shown to cry more, have more problems of the gastrointestional tract and to be more active after birth, Dr. Sontag said. In early childhood such children, through statistical correlation, have been shown to experience greater anxiety than their peers.

Animal experiments, too, have shown the vulnerability of the fetus to environmental factors. Rats born of mothers that were handled frequently and lovingly in pregnancy differ from rats born of mothers that experience pregnancy in total isolation. Adolescent rats of "deprived" mothers were slow to leave their cages, for example, and were less prone to explore their surroundings.

It is difficult to isolate noise as a determining factor in the behavioral problems of children, Dr. Sonag said, because so many other factors play upon the development of a human infant after birth and the maturation process of humans is so long compared with that of other animals.

It had been shown in animal studies, however, that rats born of mothers exposed to noise pollution during pregnancy had more difficulty in learning maze patterns than rats born of unstressed mothers.

Human festuses do react to noise, Dr. Sontag said. Loud clapping, for example, will cause an unborn infant to stir in the womb.

In one recent experiment mothers late in pregnancy were asked to choose their favorite music and to listen to it for 10 minutes. Both fetal and maternal heart rates rose in response to the music.

Dr. Sontag said he thought the mother's psychophysiological response to the music was probably what caused the unborn infant to respond. Thus, environmental factors were transported to the fetus through the mother's emotional response to the situation. Both soothing music and annoying sounds, presumably, could affect the fetus in this way.

Dr. Sontag said he now felt he had mustered enough evidence regarding the vulnerability of the human fetus to environmental stress to "justify our concern about the possibility of fetal damage from such violent sounds as sonic booms.

"It seems not unlikely that adults are not alone in their objection to such noxious stresses," he said. "The fetus, while he cannot speak for himself, may have equal or greater reason to object to them."

LEAD, GASOLINE ADDITIVES, AND SMOG: 1961–70

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, air pollution confronts us as the most visible—and most potentially dangerous—of current environmental problems.

I think, also, it is the most easily solved.

Unfortunately, however, despite all the rhetoric, all the proposals, all the current laws and regulations, we do not seem to be making necessary headway.

There is no need for multiyear, exotic research projects to find the means of eliminating smog. I remain convinced that existing technology could clean all our air—if sufficient pressure were brought by citizens and public bodies upon polluters.

For example, today I would like to concentrate upon just one element of this crucial struggle—the place of motor vehicle fuels and the relationship between fuel composition and air pollution. Motor vehicle exhaust emissions still comprise the single greatest cause of smog, and significant changes in fuel composition can be a major component in lowering vehicle-caused pollution.

Nine years ago this week, as a member of the California State Assembly, I introduced a new bill, A.B. 2335, which proposed a gradual elimination of lead in gasoline to be sold in California. I now insert a copy of that bill in the RECORD at this point:

ASSEMBLY BILL NO. 2335

An act to add Sections 20784 and 20785 to the Business and Professions Code, relating to standards of purity for gasoline and diesel fuel

The people of the State of California do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 20784 is added to the Business and Professions Code, to read:

20784. It is unlawful for any person to sell, offer for sale, assist in the sale of, permit to be sold or offered for sale, or delivery or offer to deliver to any premises for the purpose of sale any gasoline which:

(a) Has a sulfur content in excess of one-twentieth of 1 percent by weight.

(b) Has an acid heat of reaction when tested by the American Society of Testing Materials, Designation D 481–39, in excess of 30 degrees Fahrenheit. On November 1, 1961, and on the first day of each month thereafter, the maximum heat of reaction permitted by this subdivision shall be reduced 1½ degrees Fahrenheit until the maximum heat of reaction allowable has been reduced to 12 degrees Fahrenheit.

(c) Contains any metallic additive, except tetraethyllead.

(d) Has a tetraethyllead content in excess of three milliliters per gallon. On November 1, 1961, and on the first day of each month thereafter, the maximum amount of tetraethyllead which may be contained in gasoline shall be reduced three-tenths of a milliliter until the use of tetraethyllead in gasoline is prohibited.

SEC. 2. Section 20785 is added to said code, to read:

20785. It is unlawful for any person to sell, offer for sale, assist in the sale of, permit to be sold or offered for sale, or deliver or offer to deliver to any premises for the purpose of sale any diesel fuel which has a sulfur content in excess of one fourth of 1 percent by weight.

Almost 7 months later, a special assembly interim committee conducted a 1-day hearing on the subjects of motor fuel composition, use of fuel additives and their relationships to smog creation.

I have recently gone through the transcript of that hearing, and I have picked out a number of excerpts which I think are relevant today. For, as can be seen, 9 years ago, the very serious dangers of lead additives were well known, the dramatic increase of lead and other additives were shown as key factors in smog formation, and viable existing solutions and remedies were available.

Here, for instance, is testimony on health hazards of lead in gasoline.

Mr. Charles Willard, Citizens' Anti-Smog Action Committee:

Any statement that is made to you that lead poisoning is not serious is untruthful. There is no other way to describe it.

Lead poisoning is in the ancient historical books of metallurgy and this poison goes back a thousand years or more. The French Government barred the use of lead paint some fifty years ago because painters became poisoned in the way that was known as painters colic, it was actually lead poisoning. A few years ago, maybe two years ago, our county medical department banned the sale of toys because they were painted with lead paint. And yet that same medical department came before you today and put up a long mixed conversation as to whether or not the lead was poisonous. In a conversation with a doctor of chemistry last week the subject of this lead poisoning came up, and he said, "If the people knew what goes on at the laboratory, they would immediately demand restriction in the use of the lead material in gasoline." His exact words or nearly exact words were, "The people should know how many men who are chasing butterflies up and down the river are on the pension rolls of this company." He further said, "Every so many days you will see a man with a little patch on his ear. He has been to the plant doctor and had a sample of his blood taken. And when they become loaded to a certain extent they very carefully are sent off to another department." And further, "If the public knew how many people that have worked in this business were loaded with lead to the point they had to be pensioned, people would no longer want this lead in the gasoline."

Mr. Chandler Phillips, Consulting Mechanical Engineer:

You will die just as surely from small amounts of lead poisoning inhaled over a period of time as you would if you swallowed the same amount of a less toxic lead.

Chairman THELIN. Mr. Phillips, are there any medical or scientific authorities who support the views that you have expounded relative to the condition of lead in our atmosphere in this area?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have private communications that I was asked not to divulge where public health officials said that one of the symptoms of air pollution poisoning was an incipient or almost a chronic type of lead poisoning.

Chairman THELIN. You cannot give us the source of this statement though?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I can if I am required to.

Mrs. Clara McDonald, Citizens' Anti-Smog Action Committee:

Public Health Bulletin No. 253 shows that 47.4 percent lead of what we breathe into the lungs stays there until death.

On additives now used in gasoline, as well as in the lubricating oil, it further increases our pollution, creates intolerable health conditions and deaths, according to the findings of engineers, chemists, and the majority of the medical profession.

Mr. John Maga, chief, bureau of air sanitation, State department of public health:

However, there has been, and this is somewhat related to additional measurements in the area, a widening out or spreading out of the [smog] levels, so that areas which were not affected with this high value, such as Riverside, San Bernardino and the San Fernando Valley, are now having higher exposures, more frequent and higher levels of air pollution. This is probably a result of the growth in the fringe areas, the expanding out from the center of the population spreading people in cars throughout the area. It still is quite high. Quite high levels of air pollution are experienced, severe eye-irritation, of course, on frequent intervals.

Assemblyman RUMFORD. That's all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman THELIN. Any other questions. Mr. Brown?

Assemblyman GEORGE BROWN. Mr. Maga, I want to ask you a few questions on this lead matter if I may. Your Table 4 on atmospheric lead does show that Los Angeles has the highest average concentration of any of the cities tested, is that right?

Mr. MAGA. That's correct.

Remember now, this hearing took place 9 years ago.

Dr. Robert Kehoe, University of Cincinnati:

Assemblyman BROWN. Yes. It seems to me that what you are saying is that a larger percent of the lead which is breathed is absorbed than that which is eaten.

Dr. KEHOE. Under equivalent conditions with reference to solubility and so forth, yes, this is distinctly true.

Assemblyman BROWN. Your testimony concurred with that previous witness that the level of lead in the atmosphere in Los Angeles is substantially higher than it is in Cincinnati or the average of other cities in the United States. Your figure was, well, two to four or six times as much, is that right?

Dr. KEHOE. No. Two to perhaps four times as much, depending on where you are centered. I was very cautious, however, if you will remember, in saying that in connection with these, such observations in which we have problems of analysis we have more particularly problems of sampling to get something that is characteristic. The difference between two and four here. This is something that causes you to elevate your eyebrows. Statistically there is a difference, but in fact there is not much.

Assemblyman BROWN. I'm just stating this to confirm the testimony that we had from the Department of Public Health which showed several samples that run from, well, in one case 3.6 for Los Angeles compared with 2 for Cincinnati which is about twice as much, and another study showed 6.6 which I presume would compare the two and Cincinnati which is about 3.3.

Dr. KEHOE. Well, our figures for Los Angeles in connection with the study that was carried out here during a period of inversion, gave us an average figure of about 6.7. Corresponding average in Cincinnati is a little under 2.

Assemblyman BROWN. Yes. That would be your range of 4 then.

Dr. KEHOE. But the question here is, what is the average throughout the year? And this I must confess I don't know.

Assemblyman BROWN. No one would know. The point that I'm leading up to is this, that under these circumstances with this considerably greater concentration in Los Angeles which is inhaled and gets into the respiratory system, how do you account for the fact that there is no observable trace of this in terms of a difference in your mean blood lead level.

Dr. KEHOE. I think this can be accounted for. And please don't hold me strictly accountable for my interpretation, because this is something in which I have to go on the basis of my judgment. What I would say is probably the reason that the amount which we actually absorb from the lungs is not as great as the calculated sum which we've made.

Next, on the increase of lead and other additives in motor fuels. First, this statement by Mr. John Maga:

With the information that is now available, it would not be possible to write standards for fuel composition which would prevent the formation of "smog".

Chandler Phillips:

This chart from Public Health Bulletin shows the increase in sulfur in our premium fuel from 1941 to 1954 by the petroleum industry and it is over threefold. Here is our prewar level, here is what it was after the war. Notice what happened in wartime? We can leave it in the fuel, so why not leave it in. It's cheaper than the cleaning up of gasolines and hauling of tars and slugs and gums out and dumping them in the ocean because the Fish and Game Commission doesn't like that. Now those gums and tars can be removed and the product can be sold at a profit because what the sulfuric acid treatment removes from the fuel by the prewar treatment was acidic oxygen groups, reactive hydrocarbons, and nitrogen compounds. You get a large amount of nitrogen compound. Sometimes as much as 50% in the gasoline is composed of nitrogen compounds and California fuel proves to have the highest percentage of nitrogen. By adding hydrogen in the cracking process you convert the nitrogen to ammonia. You convert the sulfur to hydrogen sulfide which can be burned to produce acid and you create the acidic oxygen groups which are converted to water.

Charles Willard:

I want to point out to you, gentlemen, and you members of this board, that we in this country submit to some ten or fifteen tons of this material a day being distributed on our ground and over the two hundred odd days of dry weather that we have, with no rain to bog it down into mud, it blows. They are quite truthful when they say to you, "Oh, well, there is lead over here in the reservoir and there is lead over here and there." Of course, it's over there, how can it be elsewhere? There is bound to be lead. We want the elimination of it.

No later than yesterday I was in the chemical conference with a Ph. D. and a doctor of chemistry who is employed by one of the large oil companies. Inadvertently the subject of lead got loose. He said the refineries have cleaned up all the smog; there is no smog at the refineries. He should go up to the observatory in the morning and see it boiling up out over the refineries and then he would know. He said it is all up to the automobiles. I said, "What are you going to do with the lead that comes out? You are a chemist. You know you can't destroy an atom. There is no way to destroy an atom. You can chase the poor little thing around a cyclotron until it gets dizzy and falls apart. But if you are way below the atom pieces that are left, possibly make allowance to the energy that has been lost, you'll find you have the same thing in the end as you had at the start. The matter is indestructible. What you put into the gasoline tank must come out of the tailpipe. Sulphur and lead." So he said these words, "Well, the oil industry is beginning to realize that in all probability lead will be outlawed in the not too distant future."

Mr. Howard E. Hesselberg, Ethyl Corp., Research and Development Department:

Chairman THELIN. As I heard your testimony, you would state that we do not have any higher concentration of the lead anti-knock elements in California than they have elsewhere in the nation?

Mr. HESSELBERG. In September we just had these data available and I thought since this was a current hearing, it was pertinent to the State of California. These were the best data that might be presented. This varies seasonally. There are times when certain areas of the State of California have higher average TEL concentration than other areas of the country. As I commented before, the use of anti-knock compound is subject to a lot of variables and by and large I think that in Los Angeles it is true that there is, because of the specific refinery situation here, somewhat more lead used than in certain other areas of the country.

Mr. Harry Morrison, assistant manager, Western Oil & Gas Association:

Gasoline, like other products in our modern society, is constantly being improved. It must be changed to meet the new requirements and conditions of use. This must be done at a minimum cost to the consumer as this commodity has now become a necessity.

Fifty years ago gasoline was an unblended, unsophisticated, straightforward, simple hydrocarbon mixture. Many a Model T Ford has been run right on the job at a well site from a completely unrefined product. The engines were simple, compression ratios were low, and the requirements were few.

However, the American society has required better engines and the oil industry provided the gasoline to meet its requirments. Current gasoline quality and quantity demands could not be met at a minimum cost to the consumer if present day use of additives were prohibited.

Mr. Lewis J. Fuller, Chief Deputy, Air Pollution Control Office, Los Angeles County:

It is very possible that the use of lead in gasoline adds to the smog as manifested in Southern California. Without the use of counteradditives, lead, used to raise octane, would cause fouling of spark plugs, thus leading to increased amounts of hydrocarbon losses. From an air pollution standpoint, unleaded gasoline of an acceptable octane rating would be preferable to leaded gasoline.

The hearing brought out that the means of eliminating lead from motor fuels already existed, but that there were severe hesitations by industry. Once again, Chandler Phillips:

Remember the heavier this gasoline, the higher the boiling point. This is like adding sugar to water. It boils at a higher temperature. So more heavy ends are in this fuel, this is the final boiling point. The cleaner the fuel, the lower this is. This is premium gasolines from Southern California in the summertime and this is premium gasolines in the winter. You see the same reports. This is the heaviest fuels, this is the lightest fuels. We see the same picture in the regular gasolines. Both summer and winter. We are getting now a gasoline that is heavier than our peak wartime condition. It was patriotic to burn it then; it is not today, gentlemen, it's deadly. Our lung cancer has increased at alarming rates. We have twice as many tooth cavities in our children as any other area. We have a limited air supply. Why should we release known poisons into the air and have to breathe them? Without proper study, they would release a new poison methyl. Tetramethyl lead. This is even more volatile than ethyl lead and without any—absorbing any tests of this in the air, they conclude because it does not kill rats, it kills rats not quite as quickly as tetraethyl lead, it is safe to release to the public.

My experiments have been proven, and I released them to the public in 1954. I took on my automobile a device to analyze the vapors that were being put out and this took two forms. I equipped my motor to run on either butane or propane, a clean burning fuel, and then I could turn on a sample of gasoline I wished to test. The chamber I had on the back of my car was approximately four feet long. It had a light beam that went between two prisms and went into a photoelectric cell. I could adjust the intensity of the light source and I would in burning a clean fuel set up the intensity of the light source so my photoelectric cell read 100 on my reference fuel. I would then turn on the electric pump and pump in gasoline and keep the motor at the same speed. These other fuels burned dirtier. I took that same gasoline and treated it by the refining method known as the 98% sulfuric acid treatment and it removed these impurities and the fuel when retested, burned clean and reduced light by the cleanliness was five or six times. I took the vapors out and passed them through a large plastic bag and irradiated them to see the photochemical reaction that would take place on the two fuels. The cleaned up gasoline produced very much less. I brought this up before the Air Pollution Control District and they performed part of my experiments. They checked the photochemical reaction of a cleaner fuel with one with a higher content. They reported that they could reduce air pollution two-thirds in the aerosols by this method. They also had the Bureau of Mines testing station at Bartleville, Oklahoma perform the test on the other half and using a regular motor gasoline compared the iso-octane, they reported a sevenfold reduction in air pollution by cleaning up the fuel. I claim that if iso-octane was available today for all the cars and the lead was eliminated from the air, we would have a substantial reduction in our air pollution problem.

And:

Mr. PHILLIPS. I think the answer to your question is this, that to have a cleaner fuel that won't knock in the motor, a large part of that fuel would have quite a bit of the reactive hydrocarbon removed. However, if you notice the bill proposed to you, we proposed the sulphuric acid heat of reaction to determine the reactive hydrocarbons in the fuel and control of this method because this is the most effective way to do it and this takes in those particular reactive hydrocarbons that Dr. Haagen-Smit is speaking about that create the smog effect by the chemical reaction with the presence of nitrous oxides.

Assemblyman CAMERON. Then it is your contention that a catalytic process or cracking process of some sort is available, that not only would it make it possible to remove but would make it possible to eliminate the necessity for all additives and at the same time would take from the fuel itself the reactive hydrocarbons. Is this correct?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Such a process is now available. It takes a reactive hydrocarbon and olefin and combines it with a saturated carbon hydrocarbon and produces a chemical known as iso-octane, which has a rating of 100 percent of 100 anti-knock rating. It contains no lead as used in the reference for checking the proponents of all fuels produced by the refinery.

Assemblyman CAMERON. Now, what about the further burning of this fuel in an internal combustion engine in the effect that this would have on the release of additional hydrocarbon compounds or olefin compounds that were not present in the refined fuel that are present in the combusted fuel.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Two studies have been made on that compared to my original research which proved that by cleaning up the fuel with a 98 percent sulfuric acid treatment that the ability of the fuel to pollute the air was directly related to its acid head of reaction. Now the air pollution control district with research of Dr. Matter has proved that a fuel not completely cleaned up but with a lower olefin content would not produce as many air pollutants by approximately two-thirds. The Bureau of Mines have also found out—and this was taking the fuel and combusting it in the engine then irradiating it for two hours with sunlight and bringing it back and checking it—and they found that a cleaner fuel did not produce this photochemical reaction. The Bureau of Mines also found out that using iso-octane, which I have just mentioned to you—as a motor fuel compared with present day motor fuels, that air pollution could be reduced on approximately an eight fold reduction.

Assemblyman CAMERON. And it is your contention that these fuels can be produced from the crudes that are available in the market area in Southern California with a great variance and specific gravities of the crudes available?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, this will require hydro cracking process to remove these from the fuels. But the oil company receives an increased yield by doing such a process.

Assemblyman CAMERON. Increased yield in what sense?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Increased yield of more products. They combine hydrogen with it and the olefins become saturated hydrocarbons which do not have this ability to react and the impurities of nitrogen and sulfur are removed and can be sold commercially.

Assemblyman CAMERON. Is this the process that is being used by the American Oil Company you keep referring to?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I imagine it is partially being used by oil companies in this area, but not to an extent great enough——

Assemblyman CAMERON. This is not an answer to my question, sir—my question is what is the American Oil Company doing that makes their fuel so distinct and different from that that is available by other companies?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, I can't answer that question on what they are doing in their refineries, because I don't know, I've never been there.

Assemblyman CAMERON. Your favorable comment to the American Oil Company then is solely attributable to a 1954 advertisement in Life Magazine?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, not solely. There is no reason why if one company can do it that another can't do it.

Assemblyman CAMERON. You are not aware of what the specific gravity or the type of crude is that they are using from which they are producing this unleaded fuel.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am aware that they are producing it in Texas and I am also aware that the Shell Oil Company has some very high crudes from West Texas that they have sulfur removal plants and they are making competitive products with them now. So I would say that that could be done with any type crude if they are willing to hydrogenate it.

Assemblyman CAMERON. This is not based upon any specific technical knowledge, though, as to what American Oil Company is or is not doing, but this is rather an assumption that you are making based upon your engineering background, is this correct?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, I know the quality and what the composition is fairly well of the American Oil Company's gasoline, but I do know they are making right in this area iso-octane which is even superior to the American Oil Company. We make it in Wilmington refinery. And this does not produce air pollution as proven by tests by the Bureau of Mines. So I see no reason why this process cannot be expanded and by a slow method of changing this that there is no big economic dislocation to the oil companies. It will cost maybe a half million dollars just to put devices on the tailpipes of cars, and hundreds of employees to check and you will have only at best a device that will save 50% average efficiency. If you can reduce air pollution eight fold or even two-thirds by a cleaner fuel at a cost to the oil companies that they have already estimated, it is about one-fourth the amount the public will have to spend for afterburners. It certainly seems that this is a better method to proceed or a way to proceed.

Then, Mr. Phillips noted:

There never has been a history of a pollutant put into the air that was voluntarily removed where it was more profitable not to do so unless it was by legislative action.

Now, Mr. Charles Willard:

No later than yesterday I was in the chemical conference with a Ph. D. and a doctor of chemistry who is employed by one of the large oil companies. Inadvertently the subject of lead got loose. He said the refineries have cleaned up all the smog; there is no smog at the refineries. He should go up to the observatory in the morning and see it boiling up out over the refineries and then he would know. He said it is all up to the automobiles. I said, "What are you going to do with the lead that comes out? You are a chemist. You know you can't destroy an atom. There is no way to destroy an atom. You can chase the poor little thing around a cyclotron until it gets dizzy and falls apart. But if you are way below the atom pieces that are left, possibly make allowance to the energy that has been lost, you'll find you have the same thing in the end as you had at the start. The matter is indestructible. What you put into the gasoline tank must come out of the tailpipe. Sulphur and lead." So he said these words, "Well, the oil industry is beginning to realize that in all probability lead will be outlawed in the not too distant future."

Mr. Howard Hesselberg commented on the industry's vantagepoint:

Chairman THELN. You apparently are convinced if you eliminated the anti-knock compounds that the price to the public would go up considerably?

Mr. HESSELBERG. It certainly is going to go up to the man that is going to have to make the gasoline, and I think normal economics indicate that a certain percentage of this increase would be expected to be passed on to the consumer.

Chairman THELIN. You feel that the factors of production and so on do have something to do with the price we pay for gasoline?

Mr. HESSELBERG. This is true in our business.

So did Mr. Harry Morrison:

Anything is economically possible. It depends upon what people want and what they'll pay for. I feel that there is no question but what at some kind of a price somewhere you could make gasoline that was unleaded. Let me come directly to the point and answer the question that hasn't been put yet. We ourselves, out here, ask ourselves, what would it cost to provide unleaded gasoline? And we ask all of our members. Give us a number. What—how do you think you could do it? I'm not trying to be at all light about this, but with fairly light hearts they went at it to see what they could come up with, and then I began to get telephone calls back, and they said, we can put numbers down, but we can't guarantee that we can meet the requirements in octane and the requirements in quantity day in and day out that we would be required to provide, because we can't segregate, there is no point in making unleaded gas for Los Angeles County and leaded gasoline for Orange County, aside from the very fact of the unfairness of it. And you can't stop at state borders. So that what they finally concluded to me was that they are unwilling to state as engineers and as chemical engineers that there can be provided at all times adequately unleaded gasoline at any price. That's the answer.

Chairman THELIN. Are there any further questions of Mr. Morrison?

Assemblyman BROWN. You heard the testimony earlier that the American Oil Company premium gas was priced at one cent per gallon higher than the competitive gasoline. Is that right? Presumably that represents the minimum differential that would be required?

Mr. MORRISON. Actually, Mr. Brown, although I don't know of my own knowledge, I have been told that subsequently that one cent was eliminated and that the gasoline is being sold at a price competitive with the others. I do not believe—I'm sorry, but I have to answer your question this way—I do not believe that the price at which Amoco sells its gasoline can in any way be considered to be a function of the difference in cost.

Assemblyman BROWN. In other words, you're lending credence to the testimony we also heard that there is no relationship between the market price and the cost of production. Is that right?

Mr. MORRISON. No, I'm not at all, sir. Because I believe that we have to consider that Amoco is selling three grades of gasoline and is competing in a market.

Assemblyman BROWN. Are you familiar with the statement made by the—by Mr. Griswold earlier last month to the effect that the cost of selling unleaded gasoline would probably run about two cents a gallon?

Mr. MORRISON. I heard that Gris said that.

Assemblyman BROWN. Do you have any knowledge of the economic basis on which he made this statement?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir, I do not.

Assemblyman BROWN. It didn't come from your industry, then?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir.

Assemblyman BROWN. You made the earlier statement here that the products of combustion resulted in the formation of carbon dioxide and water, which would be harmless. You are referring only to these particular organic additives that we are speaking of, not the lead additives. Is that right?

Mr. MORRISON. No, I'm referring only to these nonmetallic additives.

Assemblyman BROWN. The earlier testimony on the lead additives seem to indicate that the result was a substantial lowering in the lead content of the blood of the people in Los Angeles compared with other parts of the United States. So presumably, if the lead causes a reduction in the lead in the blood and you're—the organic components have no effect, then probably we would be unwise to remove either of them, since the only result could be unhealthful?

Mr. MORRISON. I'm sorry, sir. I lost you.

Assemblyman BROWN. I was trying to make a rather obtuse point, actually I'm quite a bit concerned about this economic situation as far as removing the lead from the gasoline is concerned. You state that American Oil Company sells their unleaded gas at no difference in price. Another witness said one cent higher. Griswold has stated in some testimony that unleaded gas could be produced at two cents higher, and we've also had evidences to the effect of lead on the exhaust devices which is somewhat inconclusive. The testimony from the Ethyl Corporation was to the effect that they had not road tested unleaded gasoline on their catalytic devices, so they had no evidence on its—as to its effect on the life of the catalyst. You are not prepared to testify on that, I presume, are you?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir, not on the lead item.

Assemblyman BROWN. Well, I hope that the witness from the Air Pollution Control District can testify on that because the article which I read indicated that the lead had the effect of decreasing substantially the life of the catalyst. Now, you are not in a position to offer any testimony.

Mr. MORRISON. Well, I've read what Gris had to say on that subject in his report and have discussed this just as an individual with a number of people and it is my understanding that there has been a problem there. However, I was rather encouraged, I say, encouraged because from a personal point of view because the least expenditure called upon to eliminate smog the better off we all are was when Mr. Griswold, in his report, stated that one company had developed a catalyst which was showing good signs of not being affected by leaded gasoline and again, expressing a personal viewpoint, I would think that this is a field which should lend itself and it should require a great deal of additional work to find out what the answer is.

Assemblyman BROWN. Well, let me make this economic statement and see if you can concur with it. If it would cost, say, two cents a gallon to take the lead out of the gas, which would amount to around $16 per year for the average motorist, which is the figure that Griswold used, and that results in the ability to use a catalytic exhaust device which can be manufactured at an amortized cost of—which is $16 per year cheaper, then it would actually cost nothing, if we require a catalytic exhaust device within the near future which we apparently will, it would actually cost the motorist nothing, or it would cost the consumer nothing by virtue of the cheaper device if you were to take the lead out of the gasoline. In other words, the extra cost of the gasoline would be compensated by the lower cost of the catalytic device.

Mr. MORRISON. I'm familiar with that point, Mr. Brown, as I understand what you're saying is that it costs two cents to take the lead out and you could save a year of your catalyst, you would be saving "X" additional dollars and you'd be ahead and that would make good reasoning if the two cents were a proper figure. I'm not prepared to say it is. What I have already stated I stand on, that's the problem.

Assemblyman BROWN. Yes. I bring this out to indicate the importance of trying to get a figure here, because we can't make a judgment on this, speaking as a legislator, unless we do have some figures.

Mr. MORRISON. I can see your problem and we will do everything we can to give it to you. I talked to these engineers about this thing and, if you don't mind, let's put ourselves in their position. The boss says, or your folks request, how much will it cost to do this? They have to be pretty darned positive as to where this will lead them. Right now, they are not in any position to reach any conclusions at all.

Assemblyman BROWN. This would completely disregard the health effects of the lead because if it is economically more desirable to have an unleaded gasoline in terms of its total cost to the consumer considering gasoline and catalytic exhaust device, then economically it's better business to operate that way even if it has no effect on the health.

One final area discussed was the possibility of leaded gasoline reducing effectiveness of catalytic smog control devices. The witness, Lewis Fuller:

Assemblyman BROWN. I don't like to belabor this, Mr. Chairman, but I was very much interested in this question of the effect of lead on the catalytic devices. Do you have—are you able to testify on that subject?

Mr. FULLER. I have the report, sir, which you have in front of you. The relevant portions there are on pages 11, 12, and 13. This was the report which Mr. Griswold just made after his return from Michigan, where he visited those manufacturers.

Assemblyman BROWN. Well, he states here that the total life of the catalyst is substantially reduced. Some estimates indicate that the same catalyst could well perform for as well as 50,000 driving miles if exposed only to the exhaust from nonleaded fuels as contrasted to 12,000 miles if the vehicle is operated on leaded gasolines. In other words, it seems to me that we are saying that the device will last, well, we'll say essentially one year, which would be 12,000 miles in driving or it would last for four years, if it were on unleaded gasolines and if the cost of these devices runs around $75 each or somewhere in that vicinity, we could be saving somewhere in the neighborhood of $300 by—well, we could be saving in the neighborhood of $75 per year—we'll say, $60 per year, if we used unleaded gasoline and the unleaded gasoline would cost us $16 per year. In other words, we could save ourselves about $40 per year in the cost of devices if we used unleaded gasoline. That arithmetic is very rough, but——

Mr. FULLER. That is the report, sir, which Mr. Griswold made upon his return.

Assemblyman BROWN. Well, that, of course, assumes the two cents per gallon cost for removing the lead which is open for question because the industry hasn't been able to testify as to the cost.

Mr. FULLER. That's correct.

Assemblyman BROWN. This is the only point I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman.

Assembly bill 2335 never passed the California Legislature, and the next year I was elected to the Congress. Nevertheless, I feel that the October 1961 hearing raises many points which deserve current attention.

Many of us rejoiced when the major automobile manufacturers and the fuel companies announced within the past month or so that they were aiming to eliminate lead from gasolines. Their first notices indicated that such action was on slate for the near future.

However, if what the following article from the Los Angeles Times says is true, then we must be prepared to adjust our thinking once again. The article follows:

GM MODIFIES CALL FOR LEAD-FREE GASOLINE

(By Dan Fisher)

SACRAMENTO.—General Motors Corp. Thursday modified its call for lead-free gasoline, suggesting a low-lead content grade be permitted until the 1975 model year.

Edward M. Cole, GM president, said the modification would ease the changeover burden on the oil industry and reduce cost to consumers, yet permit auto companies to meet 1972, 1973 and 1974 emission standards.

He proposed a two-fuel system—paralleling the position expressed Wednesday by Fred L. Hartley, Union Oil Co. president, before a special two-day State Air Resources Board meeting here.

Cole said that for California, regular-grade fuel should be modified from the present 94 octane level to 91 octane, permitting a maximum of 0.5 gram of lead per gallon. Currently, regular leaded fuels contain about 2.5 grams per gallon of lead.

LEAD-FREE

Meanwhile, Cole suggested, a premium leaded fuel, containing up to four grams per gallon of lead, and registering 97 octane should be permitted.

That fuel would be available as long as old cars required it, but the 91 octane regular would have to be completely lead-free by the time 1975 models appear, Cole said.

The GM president revealed experimental cars running now that will meet 1980 federal emission standards, but must have lead-free fuel to operate.

The cars are so clean that GM's equipment cannot measure emissions from them, Cole testified. "I have no fear of our technological competence to meet the standards for 1980 if the proper fuel is available," he said.

The company is known to have antismog catalysts that will last for 60,000 miles or more as long as fuel is lead-free.

Cole said, however, that he was not asking for legislation to force removal of lead.

Hartley, meanwhile, told the board legislation is needed that would limit oil companies to producing only one grade of leaded fuel and at least one grade of leadless gasoline.

He suggested that the board require a low-lead or leadless fuel be available by Jan. 1, 1971. If it is a low-lead grade, he said it should be outlawed by Jan. 1, 1974.

REQUIRE MODIFICATION

Hartley's proposal, which would have a 97 octane, leaded fuel as well as the leadless 91 octane grade, would require many motorists to have their current cars modified to run satisfactorily on the lower octane grades. This would involve, Cole told the board, a minor modification in spark timing that would take "less than 20 minutes of labor" and could be done in any service station. If the change was made as part of a normal tune-up, it would cost nothing extra, Cole said.

Hartley suggested that before an owner could relicense his car he would have to show he had made the modifications.

The Air Resources Board's technical advisory committee will make recommendations on the lead issue at the board's March 18 meeting.

Contrary to Mr. Cole, I believe that it is possible to have all lead out of motor fuels within 2 years, and I plan to sponsor legislation which will accomplish that objective.

If it was possible to produce a lead-free gasoline in 1961, then it is certainly within our capabilities to do the same today. For example, the following "Smog-o-gram"—distributed by the People's Lobby, one of the most active environmental quality groups in the southern California area—discusses technical aspects of attaining leadless fuel:

SMOG-O-GRAM

Changes in refining methods during World War II brought serious health menacing air pollution to southern California and 1943 was the first year that widespread crop damage was reported.

Former method: Thermal cracking. We had cracked gasolines prior to World War II:

(1) The gasoline was cracked in tightly enclosed chambers where none of the dangerous gases escaped into our air.

(2) Then the gasoline was treated with 98% sulphuric acid which removed (a) Impurities of sulfur, nitrogen compounds, oxygen compounds (b) Certain reactive hydrocarbons which would have reacted in sunlight to create ozone. Less lead was needed because more impurities were removed.

Present method: Catalytic cracking. The change to this type of cracking process caused serious air pollution because—

(1) The gasoline is not cracked in tightly enclosed chambers and the dangerous gases are expelled from stacks at the refineries.

(2) The gasoline is not treated with 98% sulfuric acid treatment and our motor fuels contain (a) More impurities which make them dirty burning, producing greater amounts of pollution from combustion and (b) More reactive hydrocarbons that will react with sunlight when they escape unburned due to incomplete combustion, evaporation, loading operations, storage, etc. More impurities require more lead.

Modern method: Hydrocracking. Not used in the L.A. area. This cracking process is the most beneficial for all concerned because:

(1) It increases the yield (to repay the cost of conversion).

(2) Reduces air pollution by removing dirty burning impurities (a) Saturating the reactive hydrocarbons with hydrogen making them non reactive in sunlight, (b) Increases the heat content of the fuel causing more complete combustion, (c) Gasolines cracked in enclosed chambers eliminating large emissions of pollution now expelled from catalytic cracking process at refinery. Less impurities requires less lead.

HOW TO MAKE HIGH OCTANE GASOLINE FOR MODERN MOTORS

Remove the impurities, saturate the hydrocarbons with hydrogen and make a white, clean burning motor fuel which needs no lead or other additive.

American Oil Company, in the East, makes a 96 octane, unleaded white gasoline that will not knock in any modern high compression motor.

Gulf Refining Company, in the Midwest, removes a Teacup of dirty burning tailends from each gallon of their gasoline.

Lead is just one gasoline additive, and even a complete elimination of lead will not cause a full reduction of motor vehicle exhaust emission pollution. The following article about Dr. Agatha Magnus puts the issue into a somewhat broader perspective:

THE PUBLIC MAY LOSE BECAUSE IT DOESN'T KNOW WHAT SMOG IS ALL ABOUT: DR. AGATHA MAGNUS, WORRIED SCIENTIST

(By Leslie Berkman)

As Los Angeles County fights to retain a federal conspiracy suit against auto manufacturers for delaying smog control and citizens around the country sign petitions to put an anti-smog amendment on the national ballot, a senior citizen from Pasadena with a Ph. D. in biology and a lifetime working interest in practical science worries that the public will lose its case because it doesn't know what smog is all about.

Dr. Agatha Magnus, who was an electronic scientist at the Naval Ordnance Laboratory in Corona before becoming an independent inventor, says that for 10 years people have been misled to believe that hydrocarbons are the culprits in the production of nitrogen dioxide, commonly known as smog.

She said that ever since A. J. Haagen-Smit, professor of biology at Cal-Tech, proposed that smog was the product of a photochemical combination of hydrocarbons and ozone by ultraviolet light, the United States government and automobile manufacturers have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to remove hydrocarbons from the atmosphere.

Much time and money were spent to develop automobile engines that would more completely burn—and thus eliminate—hydrocarbons during combustion, Dr. Magnus notes. But unexpectedly, she explains, the scientists and automobile manufacturers found that while the new engines reduced the emission of hydrocarbons into the atmosphere by 33 per cent, they increased emissions of nitrogen oxides by 66 per cent.

The premise that smog is caused by hydrocarbons in the atmosphere thus proved a fallacy, says Dr. Magnus. Instead, she adds, scientists learned that the more thoroughly any fuel is burned, the more nitrogen oxides are produced.

Dr. Magnus explains that the nitrogen and oxygen in the confined air of a combustion engine unite chemically when heated to a high temperature. A new nitrogen-oxygen combination — nitrogentetraoxide — forms when the nitrogenoxides from the engine spill out of the automobile's exhaust pipe to unite with oxygen in the atmosphere. The colorless nitrogentetraoxide on cooling rises into the air and splits into gaseous molecules of poisonous brown carbon dioxide.

Dr. Magnus proposes that although scientists and manufacturers discovered that hydrocarbons are not the chief cause of smog, they have concentrated on the elimination of these pollutants because they don't know how to begin eliminating nitrogen dioxide. She fears that the public will be overwhelmed by the manufacturers' success story in reducing atmospheric hydrocarbons and fail to see the seriousness of rising nitrogen dioxide levels.

"Hydrocarbons are smelly and unpleasant, as anybody who has been in a gas station knows, but nitrogen dioxide is poisonous," Dr. Magnus emphasizes.

The supervising engineer of the State Air Resources Board, John Chipman, says that Dr. Magnus's theory on the cause of smog is shared by other reputable scientists, but is only one of many theories. Chipman admits, however, that until now virtually total attention has been directed at ridding the atmosphere of hydrocarbons rather than the more harmful nitrogen dioxide. He also admitted that the process developed for reducing hydrocarbons has increased the amount of nitrogen dioxide in the air.

"There is no device to control nitrogen dioxide at this moment," says Chipman. He adds that the State Air Resources Board supports the findings behind the adoption of State Assembly Bill 357 that by 1972 requires automobile manufacturers to learn to reduce nitrogen dioxide emissions to the level of 1966. That was the year that new devices were required in automobile engines to clean the air of hydrocarbons.

Currently, controversy in California—and other Western States—rages over the value of a new additive, F-310, which was introduced in fuel marketed by the Standard Oil Co. of California earlier this year.

Standard claims that fuel with F-310 can reduce certain emissions by up to 50 percent—and they have a group of test reports showing it. At the same time, other companies and some of the anti-smog citizens organizations contend that Standard's new fuel is not only not as effective as the claims say, but that the company has been employing false advertising procedures.

Last month I wrote to the Federal Trade Commission asking for investigation of the F-310 advertising, and I hope that the Commission finishes this study within the near future.

Another public body, the Hawaii State Legislature, has before it a resolution calling for a major study of F-310, and I would like to submit for the RECORD a copy of that resolution, which was introduced by Senator Donald S. Nishimura, along with articles from the Honolulu Star-Bulletin and Honolulu Advertiser describing the furor over F-310:

SENATE RESOLUTION RELATING TO CLAIMS MADE ON F-310 BY STANDARD OIL COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA

Whereas, the adverse health effects of air pollution have aroused public interest and concern; and

Whereas, President Richard M. Nixon cited the automobile as the worst polluter of the air in his State of the Union address; and

Whereas, Standard Oil Company of California has introduced in Hawaii a new product, named F-310, a gasoline additive which has gained wide recognition through the popular media because of the many claims made by Standard's executives on the effectiveness of F-310, the most significant maintaining that F-310 is the first commercial product that will decrease pollution-causing exhaust emissions by half; and

Whereas, the opposing views of three knowledgeable and competent specialists representing three separate groups have been publicized: Mr. Robert S. Nekomoto, chief sanitation engineer with the Department of Health, has said that F-310 will not do anything to cut down on air pollution; Dr. Sanford Siegel, University of Hawaii botanist and air pollution researcher, has stated that Standard's methods of testing F-310 are inferior and falls short of generally acceptable standards of research which results in unreliable and invalid findings; and Mr. Robert Wenkam, conservationist, has reported that the People's Lobby, a California environmental organization, claims F-310 is actually more dangerous than gasolines without additives because it only reduces carbon monoxide and visible chemical pollutants but does nothing to eliminate the most dangerous pollutants of all—oxides of nitrogen and tetraethyl lead; and

Whereas, Mr. Robert L. Kunzig, head of the General Services Administration, recently testified at a Senate commerce environmental subcommittee hearing that trials with a natural gas auto fuel have been so successful in eliminating pollution that plans are under way to convert as many as 1,000 government cars to the new system by the end of this year; and

Whereas, it is the responsibility of the State to research and control atmospheric substances that may be injurious to the health of the general public as well as to protect the general public as consumers; now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1970, that the Senate Consumer Protection Committee investigate the claims made on F-310 by Standard Oil Company of California; and

Be it further resolved that the Senate Consumer Protection Committee, after consultation with the Attorney General and the Director of the Office of Consumer Protection, report his findings to the Legislature, Regular Session of 1970; and

Be it further resolved that certified copies of this Resolution be transmitted to the Chairman of the Senate Consumer Protection Committee and the President of the Senate.

UNION OIL CO. SAYS F-310 DOESN'T IMPROVE ITS FUEL

(By Russ Lynch)

Union Oil Co. told the Consumer Protection Committee of the State Senate last night cars running on Union gasoline were not improved in tests with Standard Oil Co. of California's new F-310 additive.

Honolulu attorney Frank D. Padgett read to the committee, investigating Standard's claims for F-310, a statement by Union's planning and research manager, Dr. James B. Gregory.

Union 76 gasolines have contained "effective proprietary detergent additives" since 1956, Gregory's statement said.

"The present Union 76 gasoline detergent additive is an improved formulation . . . it contains a hydrocarbon amine different but chemically related to the polybutene amine announced as the basis for additive F-310," Gregory added.

His statement said tests in January and February by Scott Research Laboratories (the organization whose tests have been cited by Standard as the basis for most of its claims) showed that:

Operation of automobile engines using Union 76 gasolines containing Union Oil Co.'s proprietary detergent-dispersant additive cannot be improved by using gasoline containing F-310 additive from the standpoint of hydrocarbon or carbon monoxide exhaust emissions."

Gregory's statement said Union's own tests showed that miles per gallon in 11 test cars which had operated exclusively on Union gasolines from 26,000 miles to 66,000 miles did not improve after 1,700 miles on gasoline with F-310.

Eneas D. Kane, the Standard research chief here for the hearings, was given the right to reply to the Union statement by committee chairman Sen. Donald S. Nishimura, D-7th Dist. (Palolo-Hawaii Kai.)

Kane said he agreed with Gregory's general findings as to what happens in an engine.

"I do want to emphasize, however, that a carburetor detergent and F-310 are two different things," Kane said.

And he said Standard Oil itself produced the first detergent additive in 1954, 16 years ago.

"It's been successively improved until we developed F-310," Kane said.

Under questioning, he reaffirmed his belief that F-310 produces a better result towards clean air by cutting exhaust emissions than any other gasoline additive.

[From the Honolulu Advertiser, Mar. 7, 1970]

F-310 CLAIMS DISPUTED BY UNION OIL

A Union Oil Co. spokesman told legislators Thursday that Standard Oil's highly publicized F-310 gasoline doesn't do anything that his firm's product hasn't done for years.

Standard Oil Co. of California has advertised its new gasoline additive as a breakthrough in reducing air pollution and in keeping automobile engines clean.

The State Senate's Committee on Consumer Protection and Criminal Code Revision has held two nights of hearings on Standard's claims.

A statement was read to the committee from Dr. James B. Gregory, manager of Union's Planning and Research Department.

Gregory's statement said Scott Laboratories of San Bernardino, Calif.—the same lab which tested F-310 for Standard—also ran tests in which F-310 was added to Union's gasoline.

He said the tests showed that Union's product "cannot be improved by using gasoline containing F-310 additive from the standpoint of hydrocarbon or carbon monoxide exhaust emissions." These are major causes of automobile-produced smog.

His statement said other tests by Union show that mileage is not improved by adding F-310 to gasoline.

Robert Nekomoto, chief of the Air Sanitation Branch of the State Department of Health, told the Consumer Protection Committee that Scott Laboratories has the reputation of being "a top research agency."

Nekomoto said the Health Department does not have the necessary equipment to make its own tests of Standard's claims about F-310.

But he said that if the claims can be proved Standard will have made "a substantial contribution" to air pollution control.

Eneas D. Kane president of Standard's Chevron Research Co., told the Committee headed by Sen. Donald S. Nishimura. Palolo-Hawaii Kai Democrat, that F-310 was not the final answer to automotive smog prevention but was "a step toward the solution."

He said that Standard had taken a substantial step in reducing air pollution by adding F-310 to its gasoline and had presented its claims fairly in its advertising.

Of Union's claims that F-310 did nothing more for that gasoline, Kane said that was Union Oil's opinion, not that of Scott Laboratories.

He said Union was not using Scott's statements, but had made its own analysis of data submitted by the laboratory.

Improved motor fuels can contribute immensely to abating smog. However, we must have thorough knowledge of the effects caused by altering fuel composition, and we must urge—indeed, we must legislate—the petroleum industry to sell only fuels which produce the least amount of harmful pollutants. California failed to do it in 1961, and the smog which covers the State today is proof enough of this failure. We cannot afford such failure today—for California or for the Nation.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK

HON. HENRY C. SCHADEBERG

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. SCHADEBERG. Mr. Speaker, "law and order" has become a much-used phrase in today's world. But the essence of this phrase is the protection of the individual from those elements who violate the patterns of conduct and trust which are necessary for a stable society.

With the passage of the District of Columbia crime control bill, Congress has addressed itself to the most pronounced aspect of crime—street crime. This passage was needed. But there is another form of crime that is even more disastrous in its total effects that we must address ourselves to—white-collar crime.

White-collar crime has been described as a violation of trust between a dealer and a client. These violations fall into two main types: misrepresentation and duplicity, or the doublecross.

The Christian Science Monitor recently ran a 12-series article by Lucia Mouat, formerly of Janesville, Wis., of my district, that analyzed the problems involved in consumer protection, or the protection of the individual from white-collar crime that touches him as a consumer. Her articles do the best job I have seen of describing the problem and the efforts that are presently being made to correct it.

It is with real pleasure that I place Miss Mouat's article in the RECORD for the attention of my colleagues:

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—I

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—For years business has said "the customer is always right." Lately the customer is beginning to believe it. A correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor has just spent two months tuning in on the consumer climate in all regions of the United States. This is the first of 12 articles on a buyers'-reform movement armed with more facts and greater persistence than ever before.)

It is afternoon rush hour in the New York subway's Essex Station. Across the tracks a young man drops 15 cents into a machine offering three kinds of ice cream bars. He makes his choice and expectantly lifts the lid. Nothing. He pushes the coin-release button. Nothing again. In desperation he lifts the lid on each of the three choices and slams it down with increasing impatience. He turns to complain to the passersby, but they are all intent on home and supper.

Such, in essence, is consumer frustration in the machine age. It's that feeling that you didn't get your money's worth and that, as one small voice in a world of millions, you're powerless to do much about it.

The poor have felt it. Ask the East Harlem man about the $500 he had to pay for a $200 TV set on Third Avenue—just to get credit—or the housewife from the Buffalo ghetto about how her neighborhood market resorts to air spray (and some don't even bother with that) to camouflage the odor of spoiling meat. In Detroit, it's a standing joke that patrons of one market have seen the same rabbit displayed in the freezer so long that they walk by and greet it with "Hi, Harold."

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY

The middle-class buyer knows that feeling, too. Ask the man in Seattle about the set of 21 Beethoven records he ordered and how he received the canceled check promptly but never the records. Ask the Washington career girl who had to send back her coffeepot four times before it was repaired to the point where it would work. Or ask the man in Birmingham, Ala., who was driving his new car down local city streets when a tremendous noise developed. Mechanics found a carburetor screw embedded in the head of a piston. They also found the air conditioner leaking—factory workers had placed a kinky piece of rubber in its drain.

Everyone has his story. Even Mrs. Virginia H. Knauer, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs and a woman who looks confidently to the 1970's as "the decade of the consumer," has been having her buyer troubles. Her new sofa arrived last August with a broken leg. When she called to complain, the store promised a replacement by early November. As of early January, she was still waiting.

"If I had subpoena power, I'd call in the president of that company," she jokes.

Admittedly, the task of being a well-informed consumer has never been more difficult. The pressure to buy is intense. Discount and dime stores announce over loudspeakers that for the next 12 minutes—and only those—"fantastic bargains" are available in rubber-tree plants and vegetable cutters. Skilled door-to-door salesmen do not ask you whether you want their product but how you want to pay for it. All this, in a mobile society of self-service shopping where word of mouth is not the same consumer weapon or source of information it once was.

Moreover, the prevailing climate has not been conducive to consumer complaints. In this "age of approval," some call it, it is considered almost impolite (and certainly poor taste) to fully read the contract you sign rather than take the salesman's word or to admit to a desire to comparison shop.

A newly married New Yorker recently shopped with paper and pencil in her neighborhood supermarket in an attempt to get the best buy. The manager, noticing the practice was attracting the attention of other shoppers, told her: "Do me a favor, lady, and shop somewhere else after this."

A frozen-food salesman, on a no-obligation visit to a Virginia family, had the contract almost signed and sealed for a five-year supply of food. She left in a huff when the man of the house quietly asked what might happen if the family were not happy with the quality of food after two months time. Asked further for a price list, so the family could think it over, she icily replied that the company had none.

City weights and measures officials insist that a good share of their complaints about market shopweighting are anonymous. Complainants who must continue to shop at their local stores are concerned that they might be found out and penalized accordingly.

RETICENCE ON THE WANE

But this kind of consumer reticence now is fast on the wane. Spurred on by occasional success stories and their own rising indignation, a growing number of consumers are choosing to speak up loudly for what they see as their buyers' rights.

They are heartened by such examples as Ralph Nader, and his one-man crusade on auto safety, an effort that so challenged the billion-dollar auto industry that one model was forced off the market, seat belts and headrests became standard equipment, and designers began to look at the pollution problem.

It is an open question as to whether the American Bar Association report on the Federal Trade Commission would have been so sharply critical had not Mr. Nader's report, along the same line, preceded it.

Such examples prove that, even in the complex 1960's and 1970's, one individual well-armed with facts and figures can make a difference. To some degree this challenge to the establishment holds the same kind of excitement for adult shoppers, who see that the marketplace is not as it should be, as it does for student dissidents working on war moratoriums and helping the poor.

Measures of the increased consumer concern are many:

Mail. Letters often heavy with samples and tourn-out magazine ads now pour into Mrs. Knauer's office at the rate of 2,000 or more a month. Writers complain of everything from buying apple pies that have no apples to dresses with seams that unravel on the first wearing. "Often the letters are like legal briefs, with photostats of warranties and bills," says Mrs. Knauer. The letters also pile up at the offices of state attorneys general, independent consumer groups, Consumers Union (the nonprofit testing agency which puts out Consumers Report magazine), a wide range of congressional committees and federal regulatory agencies, and, of course, to individual consumer advocates.

Legislation. The handful of major federal consumer protection laws on the books have all been passed in the past two or three years. Currently in Congress well over 100 consumer-oriented bills have been introduced. The courts have shown a marked shift in favor of the consumer in the area of product liability cases.

State activity. Some 33 states now have consumer protection agencies of one form or another. Only a handful, however—Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Washington, California (attorney general's office) and a few others—are viewed as really strong. The will to help depends in large measure on strong protection laws.

Independent groups. The Consumer Federation of America, organized two years ago, now has close to 150 organizational members ranging from the Alabama Rural Electric Association to the Michigan Credit Union League. In the past few years volunteers have banded together in consumer groups in more than 30 states.

Involvement of the poor. As the consumer movement broadens to include buyers of all income levels, there is a noticeable increase in co-ops, buying clubs, and local organizations. Such groups as the Consumer Education and Protection Association in Philadelphia, which engages in direct picketing of businesses, are considered pace setters. The Office of Economic Opportunity-funded National Consumer Law Center, headquartered at Boston College and operating only since June, has nine full-time lawyers and 20 part-time law students working on legal reform steps for protection of low-income consumers.

Press. A number of newspapers now have full-time consumer writers. "Action line" columns are common and extremely popular. More newspapers are mentioning brand names. The Detroit News regularly publishes the names of merchants accused of impure food and weights and measures violations.

Certainly it's a big shift from the mid-1960's. Mrs. Esther Peterson, the first of the presidential consumer advisers under President Johnson and one who first suggested the merit of a national group such as the Consumer Federation of America, recalls: "I felt we'd never get anything done until we made people realize they were consumers, to start questioning things they'd been taking for granted." Today, she admits, she has "real satisfaction in that awareness."

ADVERTISING SHOWS

She also credits business with some strides forward since the days when industry made personal attacks on her and attempted to have her removed from office. Much of business still holds to the theory that all the "fuss" over consumerism is only a measure of society's affluence and that the consumer has really never had so much free choice. A number of prominent businessmen, however, are warning their colleagues they had better listen to consumer pleas or suffer the consequences of much more government regulation.

Some businessmen are putting out educational materials, running experiments in giving consumers more buyer information in grocery and department stores, and trying to get consumer input on their advisory boards.

Businessmen consistently argue that they, too, are consumers, but this concern often seems to show up most graphically in moments such as when a South Dakota retailer (interviewed for this series) pointed to a stack of defective merchandise he is returning to the manufacturer—"Workmanship just isn't what it used to be."

Perhaps advertising shows industry's keenest awareness of what bothers the consumer. Appliance and auto ads now stress safety and repairability. And it is noteworthy that Consumers Union (CU) is suing both Joseph B. Seagram & Sons and the Theodore Hamm Brewing Company for $500,000 apiece for capitalizing in their ads on CU copyrighted finds which put their products high on the preference list.

While even the staunchest consumer advocates do not lump all business in the "voltures" category (as some businessmen contend), they are convinced that business in general has not responded nearly as constructively as it should to the consumer movement.

"Much of what should be changed should be initiated by business rather than by legislation," says Mrs. Bess Myerson Grant, commission of consumer affairs for New York City. "Instead of fighting the bills and the rebellion of the consumer, business should start fighting the problem.

"Business keeps screaming about government intervention but it's been asking for it with this attitude of 'how much can I get away with and for how long?' The federal packaging bill is a perfect example. They knew they had to cut down on the number of package sizes and they didn't. If this attitude continues to prevail, there's going to be much more of a consumer revolt than there has been."

EXAMPLES RECEIVED

Ralph Nader is equally, if not more, indignant on the subject of business taking advantage of the consumer. In his view, the thousands of examples each day of illegal credit transactions, auto repair work never even done, of shortweighting, passing off low grade meat and high grade meat and of pumping water into poultry and hams ("The consumer is paying $32 million a year for all that water.") adds up to "unbelievable" and "very lucrative fraud."

"The whole process is systematic thievery on the part of corporations," he said in a conversation with this reporter. "Every day I get letters enclosing examples. The other day I got a piece of material that was four inches short of the four feet long it was supposed to be. And someone sent me a bottle of instant coffee that was supposed to weigh 16 ounces net—the whole thing weighed 16 ounces. . . . Corporations know with infinite precision what's going into their packages. All they've got to do is tell the consumer."

Mr. Nader characterizes the consumer movement as a "powerful, conservative" movement dedicated to such solid 19th century Sherman Antitrust Act ideals as fairness in the marketplace and more comparative information for the consumer.

Arguing that "price fixing is totally a way of American business" and that the base of competition has been narrowed to such details as games of chance and the color of bank checks, he says "the consumer movement will show that industry and commerce have been living a lie and that they're the greatest subverters of the free enterprise system there are. The leftist radicals don't even come close in terms of daily destruction of the system."

For at least the 1970's, consumer advocates predict heavy stress on environmental problems, with strong participation expected at the nationwide April 22 college teach-in. The scope of consumer concern long ago outgrew its early and narrow connotation of the housewife picketing a grocery store. Now it encompasses such diverse concerns as travel, interstate moving, taxes, and tenant problems.

MORE MILITANCY EXPECTED

More low-income militancy and direct picketing of business is expected. More of the professional and young poverty lawyers are interested. Class action court suits on behalf of groups of consumers with dollar returns will become more common.

Whatever momentum the consumer movement may have—and, as its critics allege, it may be due more to the zeal of the few than of the many—the fact remains that there is still a good deal of old-fashioned American apathy on the part of the much-discussed "silent majority."

One deputy attorney general tells of seeing a home improvement scheme in a television ad which he was sure was fraudulent. Since he had no pattern of evidence with which to build a case, he paged through the lists of contracts signed and wrote to the last 40 people on the company's list. Once contacted, more than 30 people indicated they had been cheated in some way but had not complained because they didn't feel it would do any good.

Some longtime consumer advocates, such as Rep. Lenor K. Sullivan (D) of Missouri, argue that such apathy has taken a toll in legislation.

"Congress has always been agonizingly slow in passing urgently needed consumer protection laws," she commented during a hearing last fall of the Commission on Product Safety. "The consumer drive to force us to act is still in low gear. . . . Most of what still needs to be done hasn't been done because the public hasn't cried out loudly enough."

GREAT POTENTIAL SEEN

Mr. Nader, a man who has proven that numbers don't mean everything, sees the potential of the consumer movement as the broadest-based the nation has yet seen.

"The rush is overwhelming—it's almost becoming a fad," he comments. "Other issues such as Vietnam and civil rights have divided the country into camps. Granted that sellers and buyers are opposed in the consumer movement, but there's no split at the grass-roots level. It's a 'people's movement.'"

This series stems from more than 200 personal interviews with leading consumer advocates, citizen leaders of the consumer movement, state law officials charged with curbing consumer fraud, poverty program workers, labor officials, educators, and businessmen. Some of the most common complaints in consumer mail will be explored—auto repairs, product safety, appliance warranties, food packaging, and credit problems. Also, assessments will be made of the growth of consumer education efforts, industry response to consumerism, organizational strength of the consumer movement, and the extent of legal protection. Concluding the series will be a few pointers on what the consumer may do to help himself.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—II: AUTO REPAIRS SPUTTER, MISS

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—Some 67 million Americans are married to their automobiles. They spend up to $25 billion a year on repairs to maintain the compact (as well as the station wagon, the family sedan, and so forth). But all is not bliss. Consumers face problems in the repair business that range from a shortage of mechanics—many of whom are untrained if not plain incompetent—to calculated fraud.)

TUCSON, ARIZ.—The gas gauge was nearing "empty" so the University of Arizona co-ed pulled off the freeway into the nearest service station. All went routinely enough until suddenly she noticed white smoke billowing out from under the open hood. The attendant, standing over it with a properly concerned expression, informed her that the car needed "a new accelerator in its generator" and that if she tried to drive out of the station without having it fixed, the car would be ruined.

One tank of gas and $119 later the student was back on the freeway, heading for the university campus. To confirm her growing suspicion, she took the car to her regular mechanic for a recheck. His verdict: Potassium powder had been used to simulate smoke, and she had been "conned" (a generator does not have an accelerator).

The case is not as exceptional as one might think. Despite stepped-up efforts by law-enforcement agencies and more widespread and vehement complaining on the part of car owners, deceptive auto-repair practices persist as a major consumer problem.

In California several gas stations near the southern border were suspected of pulling the same trick as the Arizona mechanic. But when the attorney general's office tried to amass a pattern of evidence, it found all 20 of its witnesses were from out of state. All had been carefully selected by their license plates. A suit was impossible.

DRIVERS LACK KNOWLEDGE

The American automobile, a complex machine of more than 15,000 parts, is regarded as an absolute necessity by most of the 67 million Americans who own one. But most motorists are in the weakest possible bargaining position when it comes to judging what, if any, repairs are needed, whether they have been done well, and what is a fair price to pay for them.

Yet each year motorists pay a whopping $20–25 billion—almost as much as a year's outlay for the Vietnam war—for auto repairs.

The consumer is a captive in more ways than one. Once his car's motor is disassembled and the trouble is found, there is usually little, if any, opportunity to shop around.

If the final bill shoots above the estimate the consumer again has little recourse but to pay—even after a hot verbal sound off.

Only if the estimate appears in print and is consistently violated can law authorities build a case for fraud.

Often it is hard to draw the line between fraud and honest incompetence. As cars have become more complex and mechanics more specialized, the varied causes of auto trouble are tested almost in isolation. It becomes a hit-and-miss process.

CHARGES COMPARED

Take the case in "Points and Plugs," part of National Educational Television's process (NET) consumer-oriented "Your Dollar's Worth" series. A woman driving a freshly tuned-up car with marked spark plugs made the rounds of several gas stations which had "mechanic on duty" signs. Each time, just before she drove in, a mechanic employed by NET adjusted the points slightly to cause stalling and rough running.

She was charged variously from $1.58 for opening the points (a fair price for the right work) to $32 for new spark plugs, points, condenser, and an adjusted carburetor (all unneeded). Other experiments run by auto clubs in Denver, Greater Atlanta, and Greater Portland, Maine, rate half of the minor repairs done by garages sampled as unsatisfactory.

Recalls Boris Holtzman, who wrote and produced the NET program: "There was very little attempt to repair instead of replace and to really define the cause of the trouble. . . . There is a great surplus of untrained mechanics who are essentially gas pumpers."

LICENSING THE ANSWER?

It is such random guessing and mistaken analysis that have led some consumers into paying for the same job twice.

Part of the problem is a nationwide shortage of mechanics. An estimated 50,000 a year will be needed over the next decade just to keep pace with population growth. The glamourless, grass-monkey image of the trade, held by many young men and their parents, has not helped.

Although licensing mechanics has been suggested as one answer to the quality problem (a few House bills propose it), the idea is rejected now by many on the grounds it would only tighten an already short supply of manpower.

Meanwhile, as Congress and consumers mull possible solutions, a number of motorists are turning to diagnostic centers as one answer. Here for $8 to $20 you can run your car through a series of compresensive machine tests and pinpoint what ails it.

Diagnosic centers also have potential for those consumers who suspect repairs done have not been done well and for used-car shoppers.

American Automobile Association Affiliates in both St. Louis and San Francisco have launched such centers. Conceding its sampling is far from random, the Automobile Club of Missouri reports that of some 2,000 cars brought to it for a repair recheck over one chunk of time, one-third were found to be unsatisfactory.

One Arizonan, in the market for a used car, ran six specimens through a diagnostic center in Tuscon before deciding on the best buy. Chet Fullington, service adviser of this center at O'Reilly Chevrolet, says the diagnostic idea also holds strong potentials for those "oversensitive" to their car troubles.

"Some people are ready to believe anything," he reports. "We had one man drive all the way down that mountain over there at 15 miles an hour because he was convinced the idler arm was going to fall off. We found absolutely nothing was wrong."

There are those who argue an intensive course in auto repairs for every motorist would go a long way toward improving a bad situation. But many consumers feel that matching expertise in this field should be no more necessary than it is in barbering, plumbing, or in mastering the trade of the airplane mechanic. They argue that the consumer who pays has a right to expect some quality.

Prices and parts delays are as much of a concern to car owners as poor workmanship. It is estimated that parts prices are generally about 60 percent higher than a decade ago. With regional variations, the average labor and service charge is between $7 and $9 an hour now. The manufacturers' argument—that in fact repair costs are down because less frequent maintenance service is called for these days—is small comfort to most motorists.

Some suggest dividing repair bills into parts, labor, and service, since the mechanic only gets about half of the current "labor" charge.

"Even the unskilled laborer gets more than $3.50 or $4.00 an hour," comments Barry McNulty, executive vice-president of the Independent Garage Owners of America, with headquarters in Chicago.

OWNERS' COSTS STRESSED

"The assumption that garage people are getting rich on the poor consumer is a big joke. The public has no idea of the cost of equipment or space. If you were repairing watches, you would work in a place the size of my office. But with car repairs, it's a different story."

Some pinpoint the problem as the piecework basis for paying mechanics. The quicker they move on to the next repair, the more they make. This is encouraged, dealers argue, by the flat-rate manuals published by manufacturers, which set time and price for each type of warranty repair.

Interestingly enough, each facet of the auto-repair business—manufacturers, dealers and independent shops, insurers, and mechanics—all side with the consumer on one or another of his many complaints. Each is ready to blame the other for negligence in coping with the problem.

This point has come up vividly in the three sessions on auto repairs held over the past year by the Senate antitrust and monopoly subcommittee. Chaired by Philip A. Hart (D) of Michigan, the state which is home to three of the big four U.S. auto manufacturers, the committee began with an investigation into high auto-insurance premiums and quickly turned the spotlight to auto-repair problems.

Design, defects, and delays figured heavily in the hearings.

Robert D. Knoll, director of the auto-test division of Consumers Union, reported to the subcommittee, for instance, that he had found an average of 36 defects in 1969 cars (more than two times the numbers he found in 1967 models) and argued that delays in receiving parts for even current model cars were "appalling"—often one to six months.

Manufacturers, of course, retort that they do recall cars for defects whenever they discover them and that they are working toward faster parts distribution.

General Motors, for instance, has just launched a giant computer operation to better feel out the geography of supply and demand.

A General Motors spokesman in Detroit argues that the "confusion" of the "paperwork empire" set in motion when parts are ordered is more to blame for delays than the number of parts.

Ford Motor Company has set up a new distribution facility in Detroit which it describes as being as big as 53 football fields, including the end zones. Ford dealers now stock catalogs of 27,000 pages of parts listings. Officials concede that in a single year parts managers may have to replace as many as 26,000 pages just to keep their listings current.

INSURANCE MEN SPEAK UP

Consumers are currently urging manufacturers to consider ease of repairability in their new car designs. They cite bumpers that sometimes need to be removed to get at the directional signals and air conditioners in the way of spark plugs under the hood. They say that with more careful planning some of the most common repair jobs could be done by less skilled mechanics—so "you wouldn't need a Ph. D. just to adjust the window panel," as one consumer advocate charges.

In a very interesting turnabout insurance spokesmen have taken to befriending the consumer in his protest against the high cost of parts and the need for design change.

In testimony before the Hart subcommittee, the insurers argued that the most common repairs are often the most expensive. The most graphic illustration of this point came with the filmed test results of four standard medium-priced cars which were crashed into barriers at 5 miles an hour. The Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, which did the experiment, reported repair bills in crashes averaged $200 each.

When one manufacturer revealed no repairs would be necessary if its cars were traveling at a 2.8 mile-an-hour speed, it brought a quip from the Rowan and Martin "Laugh In" that companies had "agreed to meet the problem by building cars that would go only 2.8 miles an hour."

For those who despair of a solution to auto-repair problems, there are signs of progress:

From the manufacturers, there is increasing emphasis on repairability in advertising. Ford has sold more than two million of its $15 home-auto tune-up kits and devotes 25 pages of the Maverick owner's manual to do-it-yourself repairs. With a new Volkswagen, a buyer gets coupons entitling his "bug" to four free diagnostic inspections for the first two years. Both Ford and General Motors have indicated bumpers on their 1971 models will be more crash-absorbent. Manufacturers are heavily involved in training new mechanics. The "big four" are at least talking of building more repairability into their designs, with parts in clusters which can be easily removed and replaced. One manufacturer has assigned an engineer to its senior stylist.

Insurance companies, no longer assured of virtually automatic rate increases and parts discounts, are considering adoption of a rating system which takes into account the varying costs of the same repair jobs in different models of cars. Consumer advocates are hopeful that this in turn might influence motorists in their choice of a car and in turn the manufacturer in his choice of design.

MORE TRAINING EFFORT SOUGHT

Dealers, service stations, and independent shops are trying with sporadic success to increase their training efforts. Just a few months ago the Independent Garage Owners of America, Automotive Service Industry Association, and the National Congress of Petroleum Retailers launched a voluntary certification program in which mechanics will be certified in accord with specific skills.

It is also worth mentioning that not all consumers put their auto-repair experiences into the "horror story" category. Consider the man from New York driving to Atlanta to visit his daughter and son-in-law. After an overnight stop in Spartanburg, S.C., he discovered his car wouldn't start. A gas-station mechanic tried for an hour to find the trouble and called in first a generator and finally an ignition specialist, fresh from his all-night shift at a nearby tractor factory. A few hours later the trouble was found—a missing piece of insulation in the ignition—and the motorist had to prod the men who had helped to take any money.

The government's role in improving the auto-repair situation (admittedly limited) is expected to be more regulatory than legislative.

The fourth and final set of the Senate subcommittee's auto-repair hearings will be held in March with representatives from the Departments of Health, Education, and Welfare, Labor, and Transportation on hand to testify. It is expected that they will be pressed to use the authority their departments now have to beef up federally aided mechanic training to develop a system of licensing garages and perhaps master mechanics with industry certification of the others, and to devise minimum federal standards for a more effective system of state motor-vehicle inspection.

WARRANTIES RESTUDIED

Changes are expected, too, in warranty regulations.

An increasing rift between dealers and manufacturer on this issue makes warranty clarification all the more imperative. It caused no small stir this month when Senator Hart released a letter, purportedly sent by the Chevrolet Motor Division of GM to its 7,000 dealers, asking that warranty repairs be restricted to defects affecting safety unless customers requested repairs.

Just this year manufacturers reduced protection time from two years or 24,000 miles to one year or 12,000 miles, whichever is longer. The five-year or 50,000-mile protection still holds on the drive trains and a few other specified parts.

Bills have been introduced in the Senate to encourage fuller and more responsible disclosure on warranties.

Also, legislative recommendations from the Federal Trade Commission, which held hearings on automobile warranties last February and has a scathing staff report on the subject, are expected to be released. No indication is given as to when—"I wouldn't try to second guess the commission," explains an FTC press officer.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—III: WILL THE REAL BARGAIN STAND UP?

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—When is a supermarket bargain really a bargain? Many see present pricing and packaging practices in the food industry as versions of the old shell game. A bill before Congress would enforce unit pricing, making comparative pricing practical.)

ST. LOUIS.—Needs of a supermarket bargain hunter: one free afternoon, an advanced degree in mathematics, and an iron determination not to be impressed by the size of a package.

This puts the case rather strongly—but so do a number of housewives. It has been estimated that collectively the dollars they "waste" in guessing wrong on economy choices run into the billions every year.

The average supermarket stocks 8,000 items, displayed in a dazzling array of weights, sizes, and brands. Though most housewives consider quality as well as price in their decisions, some say modern packaging practices make comparative pricing almost impossible. Slide rules and cardboard calculators (dispensed glady now by many retailers) generally are not viewed as a great help.

In addition to a stated price per unit of weight, some shoppers want uncoded dating of perishables and percentage labeling of ingredients.

WATER WEIGHED IN, TOO

Mr. Ruth Vasterling, a St. Louis housewife, argues that listed net weights often are no real indicators of contents. In weighing canned vegetables, for instances, she has found that often water accounts for half the net weight.

"Why should we be paying all that money to ship water around the country?" asks Mrs. Vasterling, who began weighing canned goods in accord with an ounces-per-day diet plan. "It's grossly unfair to consumers."

She contends that the canning practice is costly and a sound argument for percentage labeling and stricter content control. Manufacturers she has contacted, she says, do not take the problem so seriously. One major company, prodded by a phone call and a letter from her, sent a representative to her doorstep one day to offer her two free cans of peas. "That was supposed to pacify me," she says.

Perhaps one reason housewives and consumer advocates have delved so zealously into the area of food packaging, pricing, and labeling practices is that they find the results both fascinating and personally useful. Some are hard pressed to draw the line between confusion and outright deception.

Among their findings:

Manufacturers package prices.

It's the old story of the nickel candy bar "shrinking" inside its spacious wrapper. Rather than raise the price of his product or reduce the size of the box, the manufacturer simply "packages" the cost by cutting down the quantity. It is estimated that hundreds of items, from chile to pancake mix, are so packaged.

HOUSEWIFE JUST GRABS

"It's deliberately deceptive, a hidden cost increase that you'd never notice in a casual glance," comments Mrs. Sarah Newman, executive secretary of the National Consumers League, who points to salted peanuts and crackers as examples of such price packaging. "If prices have to go up, you might as well let the housewife know. She's still going to buy."

Often many packages of different weights look alike. Sidney Margolius, veteran consumer columnist, tells of the day recently when he and his wife spotted three loaves of bread varying from 22 to 27 ounces, all looking alike.

"The average woman spends a little over three seconds buying her baked goods," he says. "She's just going to grab, and if she thinks she's got the biggest, she may be in for a shock."

The large "economy" size is not always cheapest. A Washington, D.C., supermarket employee tells of buying three packages of aluminum foil and getting more foil for less money than in the large "economy" size. Similarly shoppers have found in the course of price surveys that "house" brands are not necessarily cheapest.

Pictures often don't tell the story.

Witness the charge that Campbell Soup feigned thickness in its product by tossing in a few marbles for its picture ads.

In last October's issue of Consumer Reports, Consumers Union did a telling picture layout on frozen pies. It pitted the picture on the package cover, usually a succulent slice, against an actual picture of the contents.

In addition to the campaign for transparent packaging of meat, weights-and-measures and consumer officials are constantly on the lookout for short-weighting and other deceptive practices. In December the Nassau County, N.Y., Office of Consumer Affairs charged that cheaper meat cuts were being priced and labeled as better cuts (such as shank passing for beefsteak boneless chuck) in 34 of 40 outlets it checked.

"Specials" aren't always special.

Consider the Portland, Oreg., housewife who found a 13-ounce bottle of shampoo on "sale" at the front counter of her neighborhood store costing more than 16 ounces of the same shampoo on the regular shelf in the rear.

Or Mrs. Alberta Slavin, who heads a two-year-old St. Louis price-survey group called "Housewives Elect Lower Prices" (HELP). She noticed baby food at a "low discount rate" of 9 cents cost more than it did the week before in the same store. When she noticed a similar aisle-end "sale" on peanut butter, with the jars the same price they had been for the last month, she was told by a clerk that for every 10 cases the store purchased, it got one free.

"This is the kind of 'Mickey Mouse' we all have to put up with because we can't remember from week to week," says the attractive housewife. "When hundreds of thousands of items are advertised constantly, it's impossible to keep track—unless you take a survey."

FTC CONSIDERS RULING

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC), through its own surveying, has charged that advertised "specials" are often overpriced or unavailable. It is considering a ruling on the subject. The food industry is expected to rebut FTC findings during March hearings.

The high price of food is probably the one issue which most annoys the majority of this nation's shoppers. Yet without concerted organizational effort—a tall order for most consumer groups—they are powerless to do much about it.

Packaging and labeling reforms appear to some consumers to hold much more potential than changes in the pricing area. But many feel that so far there has been far more talk than action.

The Fair Packaging and Labeling Act (FPLA), aimed at cutting down the proliferation of sizes and making labels more informative and easier to read, passed in 1966 after five years of hearings. Many feel it emerged much the worse for the wear.

The most noticeable improvement to the average shopper is the larger type and standardized position of the net weight on labels. Some businesses, like Jewel Food Stores in Chicago, took advantage of the already expensive opportunity to add a few other points for customers. Miss Jane Armstrong, home economist and member of Jewel's packaging committee, reports that labeling on the stores' frozen-food line was changed to include information on where the product is grown and tips for cooking and proper storage.

FPLA regulations on slack-fill and cents-off practices have yet to be shaped and funded.

Some consumers feel that the progress made in cutting back the number of package sizes has been almost as negligible. The trimming was left to industry's voluteer efforts, with strategic prodding allowed from the secretary of commerce and National Bureau of Standards (NBS).

PROMISES VERSUS PRACTICE

Producers and trade associations in 21 product areas agreed to specific reductions, largely during 1969, in their size ranges.

David Edgerly, a weights-and-measures coordinator at NBS (and one of only two men there working on the proliferation problem), says that with the exception of spokesmen for the instant-coffee industry, which offered suggestions for improvement on its own initiative, NBS went "knocking on doors."

Weights-and-measures officials in 40 states have been checking the promises against practice. Mr. Edgerly, who stresses that progress could and should have been a good deal better across the board despite the problems involved, says the soft-drink industry (which agreed to trim its inventory size range by one-third as of last July) scored fairly high, while a few areas such as adhesive bandages (which had pledged to cut the number of its sizes from 33 to 16 by last January) ranked low. Presumably the time needed to get rid of old stock is longer for the latter product. Mr. Edgerly adds that, contrary to popular myth, it is the large manufacturers rather than the small ones which produce most of the "off" or fractional sizes.

Certainly there are problems, particularly with products which range widely in density.

"With cereals you've got puffed wheat at one end and grape nuts at the other," says Robert Thurston, vice-president of Quaker Oats Company. He says his company has eliminated all fractional ounces except on a few cookie and cracker products. "You're either going to end up with all packages of the same size and a tremendous variety of weights or vice versa."

IF COMPETITION IS LET OFF

Also, if the competition is not required to follow suit, motivation is hard to develop. Mrs. Mary Gullberg, a home economist with the Consumers Cooperative of Berkeley, Calif. (CCB), which has more than 48,000 member families, says that, though the CCB has standardized weights of several items such as dried fruits and rices, its products stand almost alone.

CCB peanut butter, for instance, is in pound jars, while competing brands are packaged in 18-ounce lots. Mrs. Gullberg, who considers standardization the best answer to the problem and suggests most food products can be boxed in one-half, one-quarter, or three-quarter pounds or multiples of these, reports there was little change in standardized weights on co-op shelves between 1964 and '69.

The average consumer, who may never have seen the full range of 50 olive sizes in her particular market, may not even have noticed (or felt her pricing problems eased) when the industry cut back to 20 sizes. The same would apply to products such as cookies and crackers, which slimmed down from 73 to 56 sizes.

The basic question now is "What next?"

Some want to toughen the packaging law as it stands. To date, Sen Philip A. Hart, (D) of Michigan, author of the bill, who concedes it was "pushed, pulled, and hammered fiercely" before final passage, has put his stress on more funding for the regulatory agencies charged with enforcing and watchdogging progress.

He credits the law with having cracked the "hard line" He feels business generally held against consumerism and argues there is nothing "intrinsically" wrong with business disciplining itself.

UNIT PRICING VERSUS PROFITS

At the moment the consumer push is strong to get retailers to calculate the price per unit of each product for the shopper. Sen Gaylord Nelson (D) of Wisconsin is the sponsor of such an amendment to the packaging act. The idea has been endorsed by the Consumer Federation of American and Consumers Union, among others.

Retailers and manufacturers argue that unit pricing, particularly on the individual can or package, as the Nelson bill stipulates, would be prohibitively expensive. Industry spokesmen estimate $300 million at least to tag and update the 210 billion items on the shelves. They stress that their profit margin on sales is a slim 1.3 percent, though based on a capital investment figure that slides upward to 12.5 percent.

Several experiments are under way to find out more about cost and consumer behavior with respect to unit pricing. None so far involves stamping the new figure on the individual product itself.

New York is scheduled to begin enforcement of a citywide price-per-measure ruling Feb. 20 (more on this in a later article).

Safeway Stores in Washington has been conducting unit-pricing experiments in two stores in low-income neighborhoods for the past three months and, since December, in two more-affluent neighborhoods in Alexandria, Va. Some 70 percent of the stores' packaged products are affected.

A similar experiment in three Jewel stores in the Chicago area was begun in January.

Methods in both cases include a variety of shelf labels, posters, and cardboard and mechanical calculators. Evaluation of both projects is yet to be made.

The Berkeley co-op unit has been pricing a number of food items since 1960. Mrs. Gullberg counts the hours of labor involved in posting and updating the pricing as not worth the return in customer use.

"We've sold I don't know how many slide rules, and I've yet to see anybody use one," she comments. "If you want to calculate three things, you often forget the first by the time you get to the third. As for the information sheets we put up, people are usually pleased to see them, but they're too much work to use."

But the Berkeley home economist stresses that she thinks consumers do need more information than they get. "Arguing against that is like saying you don't need books in a library because nobody reads them; when somebody does need the information it should be there." She simply favors standardization of weights as the better method.

A recurring theme in any conversation with businessmen on unit pricing is use and the consumer's willingness to pay the cost.

"We need to be very careful we don't get boxed in with regulations that don't fill the needs and objectives of consumers," says Joseph F. Grimes, vice-president of sales at Jewel.

"Evidently there's a dearth of causes right now," adds the Chicago executive. "Consumerism has become like motherhood and the flag, with everybody jumping on the bandwagon. . . . We tend to think we're a little closer to the consumer and her thinking than many consumer advocates. We've done quite a bit of research [into unit pricing] land—we're not inflexible on this—but we find the great majority of consumers don't know what it's all about and don't want it, particularly if it's going to be very expensive."

"The danger of the consumer movement is precipitous action," says William Kagler of the Kroger Company, headquartered in Cincinnati, which has changed some 3,400 "house" labels in accord with the packaging law. "There are consumers and there are consumer advocates, but I'm not sure there's any broad-seated demand for unit pricing. . . . The problem is that nobody knows if it will really work. A cost-benefit ratio is needed to determine whether the system would be desirable or not."

CAMPUS RESEARCH PUSHED

Consumer Research Institute in New Jersey, run by James Carman, a business-administration professor on leave from the University of California at Berkeley, is digging into just such questions. Supported by trade associations for food chains, wholesale grocers and manufacturers, and food advertising agencies and magazines, the new institute manages some 20 research projects on university campuses in such fields as cents-off practices, European testing and grading programs (for comparison purposes in this country), and unit pricing. Consumer behavior receives a heavy emphasis.

Clarence Adamy, president of the National Association of Food Chains, cautions against being "absolute" on either unit pricing or standardized packages. He says the food industry can most successfully do "parts of both" and criticizes the proposed unit-pricing amendment as being too narrow in the scope of methods allowed.

In Mr. Adamy's view, the biggest problem, which he says cannot be solved by either suggested method, is that money comes in tenths and package weight in sixteenths.

"Nobody is approaching the honest problem, which is the complexity of our basic system," he says. "I believe with a great deal of integrity that the only answer is going to the metric system, and I think it's inevitable. Only three nations are left which don't have it."

In addition to the push for information that would make pricing comparison easier, there is also currently a move for percentage labeling of ingredients. Consumer spokesmen argue it is a fact that one knows more about dog food, with its thorough list of ingredients and nutrients by percentages, than about most human food.

PERCENTAGE LABELING QUESTIONED

George M. Koch, president of the Grocery Manufacturers Association, says he is quite sure that customers want and are willing to pay for the convenience of flip-top cans and the like, but he is not at all sure about percentage labeling.

"Whether that measure comes this year because of political reasons or five years from now may mark the difference between sanity in the consumer movement and regulation by panic and chaos," he says.

"We strongly support any consumer legislation that will really be helpful. But does the consumer really want this? We'd be adding a new dimension without a common denominator. If it put 2 percent more beans in my can than another manufacturer with a different pork-and-beans recipe, is the consumer further informed or more confused?"

Mrs. Esther Peterson, first presidential consumer adviser, sums up her consumer view: "The packaging bill is really a labeling bill. In some areas there are more package sizes than ever. We've either got to have forced standardization or unit pricing. If unit pricing, the simpler the better. All this gadgetry is what we want to avoid. . . . There's no reason why it can't be done. All these crazy arguments are the same ones we've run into on every possible social advance. It's always, 'It will cost too much' or 'It isn't needed.' "

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—IV: WHAT PRICE SAFE PRODUCTS?

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—Ten years ago consumers could rarely sue manufacturers when products were unsafe. But new laws and mounting court cases now are pointing the finger of liability toward business. Though voluntary reform in the field of product safety has gained, many see increased governmental action in the future.)

DETROIT.—"Everybody's in favor of safety, but it costs money," says Detroit lawyer Richard Goodman.

He and his colleague Paul Rosen, who work full time on behalf of injured consumers in product-safety cases, were showing this reporter their rogue's gallery of judicial evidence. Items ranged from an aluminum beer keg which had corroded enough to explode at a wedding to detailed photographs of a tractor-lawnmower whose loosely attached gas tank also had exploded.

Product-safety court-cases totaled some 300,000 last year, triple the number filed the year before. However severe the problem—and all admit statistics are badly needed—probably no field illustrates so well the decisive change in this nation's consumer climate over the past few years.

Court decisions are one major indicator. The responsibility for loss has been shifting gradually from the consumer to the manufacturer, even though the manufacturer may not be at fault morally. He now must anticipate possible misuse of his product by the consumer and, under the doctrine of "strict liability" being adopted in an increasing number of states, possibly accountability. He usually invests heavily in product liability insurance.

BREAKTHROUGH DESCRIBED

Prof. Thomas F. Lambert, editor in chief of the American Trial Lawyers Association (ATLA) Journal, describes this legal chance in the past 25 years as "the most dramatic breakthrough in the history of accident law."

Probably most responsible for this judicial change is ATLA, which operates a clearinghouse in the product-safety field at its Cambridge, Mass., headquarters. Here lawyer members can turn for records of similar cases to get tips on the most persuasive kinds of witnesses and testimony.

"Aggressive lawyers in the American Trial Lawyers Association have essentially changed the law by arguing and convincing many judges that manufacturers do have a responsibility for the safety of their products," comments Morris Kaplan, technical director of Consumers Union, publisher of Consumer Reports. "They've been accused of feathering their own nest, but the thrust of their actions is socially useful."

In the manufacturer's view, some consumers are simply "cashing in" on the favorable climate whether their cases really deserve it or not.

It is also true that even the threat of a court suit and even a case settled in favor of the manufacturer have been known to result in change on the consumer's behalf.

Witness the string of suits involving Corvair, largely, if not all, unsuccessful from the plaintiffs' view. Presumably the combination of these cases and the stinging publicity from consumer advocate Ralph Nader's "Unsafe at Any Speed" quashed sales to the point where General Motors took the car off the market.

Another key factor in the developing product-safety field has been the work of the National Commission on Product Safety (NCPS). Appointed by Congress two years ago and due to expire this June, it was set up to pinpoint dangerous products, review existing safety legislation and industry's self-regulation efforts, and to come up with some of its own recommendations.

Through the intensive work of its seven-member bipartisan commission, three task forces, and several contracted outside firms, the group has earned a reputation, by all measures, that few study commissions can match. Ralph Nader predicts there will not be an agency in the government in the next 10 years that will have more "impact" than the commission has had.

NCPS hearings around the country, research, and prodding are given a large share of the credit for:

Passage of the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act of 1969, which has just gone into effect. To the narrow 1966 act on the same subject, this law adds possible banning by the Food and Drug Administration of toys with thermal, mechanical, and electrical hazards.

Improvements in glass safety. The Federal Housing Authority (FHA) minimum property standard (to which almost everyone builds these days) now requires that safety glass be used in sliding glass door and in panels around doorways as well as in shower and tub enclosures in all FHA-approved homes. Legislatively, Florida, Maryland, and Oregon (and several individual cities) have stepped up requirements for the use of safety glazing in building and installation.

An across-the-board reexamination of the stringency of safety standards (which industry stresses it does periodically anyway) in such fields as ladders and lawnmowers by individual trade groups and by the American National Standards Institute (ANSI), a national standards clearinghouse. Certification groups also show increased concern.

Manufacturer action. In addition to standards revision, a few manufacturers have voluntarily recalled products. Rapaport Brothers, Inc., with its toy tunels (subject of one of the commission's hearings in Boston) is an example. Appliance manufacturers also voluntarily applied federal refrigerator safety requirements to freezers. Such groups as the Outdoor Power Equipment Institute feature TV spot commercials instructing viewers in the safe use of their equipment.

But consumer advocates insist many more manufacturers have been lax and, in fact, defensive. Technology is available, these advocates say, but safety legislation has been "piecemeal," usually passed in response to a crisis, and largely unimplemented.

The Flammable Fabrics Act of 1953, for instance, was aimed mainly at getting "torch" sweaters off the market. A federal standard was established as to what constituted too much flammability in the fabric. With 1967 amendments, the act was broadened to include upholstery, carpets, draperies, and the full range of fabrics. The secretary of commerce was authorized, after determining that any one of the materials presented a problem, to set a standard of flammability for it.

MANY AREAS NOT COVERED

So far the secretary has pinpointed rugs and carpets and children's sleepwear, underwear, and dresses as problem areas. But, red tape being what it is, the old standard of the 1953 act still prevails.

Arnold B. Elkind, the New York lawyer who is chairman of the National Product Safety Commission, describes the amended act as "an absolute farce."

Any further progress for the consumer in the product-safety field hinges on resolution of the standard problem and of whose responsibility it should be.

Of the 234 products that were to be reviewed by NCPS it was found that 48 areas, including playground, camping, winter sports equipment, and bicycles, had no standards at all. Many others were found to be very weak.

Standards have been compiled by industry on a voluntary basis. As a result, some have no teeth and most have no means of being enforced.

Industry, however, is making a concerted effort to prove that the voluntary system can work. The ANSI, for instance, in addition to a more aggressive role in telling industry where standards improvement is needed, is firmly enforcing its longtime rule that standards must be reaffirmed or rewritten every five years. Furthermore, the ANSI has been moving into the certification business, with independent third-party testing of products for compliance with ANSI-accepted standards.

Underwriters Laboratories, which has tested products for safety for 75 years and now tests about 28,000 a year, has moved toward more comprehensive "casualty testing." As of last year, for instance, UL drew a halt on allowing its seal to be used on appliance cords unless the whole appliance had been checked out for safety. Also, rather than test a product for one hazard such as the possibility of fire, UL expands its tetsing to include such other possibilities as mechanical, biological, and chemical hazards.

A tour of UL's Chicago testing lab, one of several scattered around the country, leaves the layman reporter with a convincing impression of thoroughness. One sees a maze of electric ranges, industrial switches, jukeboxes, electric guitars, and the like being tested for voltage, heat generation, and other safety considerations. There are explosion, hydraulic, and heat tests. UL also maintains a staff of 500 inspectors who keep an eye out for any changes in quality of production through periodic visits to factories.

GOVERNMENT STEP-UP PUSHED

The argument is building for a stronger government role in the field of standard-setting or at least in standard clearance and enforcement, even though industry and agencies like UL have employed most of the short supply of those with expertise to write product standards. Even some spokesmen for industry are willing to concede the need for more governmental involvement. Consumer advocates were somewhat stunned to hear the president of the Association of Home Appliance Manufacturers testify at an NCPs hearing last fall that though industry has the expertise, the government should decide which products need safety standards, pass on the adequacy of those standards, and enforce them.

Industry spokesmen, understandably inclined to think in terms of numbers and dollars, are by and large not convinced. Consider a comment at an NCPS hearing from a bottle manufacturer. He argued that 360 claims resulting from bottle accidents out of a total of 48 billion bottles sold over a four-year period is really not very much.

"The joke in that kind of response," says ATLA's Mr. Lambert, "is the calculus of numbers. It's trying to argue you have to show more probability than not. But safety isn't a question of majority vote. The gravity of the threat and the consequences are constant."

"In the consumer movement we should be working to give the buyer the maximum for his money," says Baron Whitaker, president of UL.

Consumers and industry also argue over the questions of "how safe is 'safe?' " Will it be carried to the extreme of no more kitchen knives? "There is no such thing as absolute safety as long as you've got people," comments UL's Mr. Whitaker.

Consumer advocates, however, say they are talking about products only where the risk is not apparent to the eye, and they insist many of these can be made much safer than they now are.

All sides agree that safety does not "sell" as it should and that for many consumers it is not a high priority in choosing a product. "There's a tired public attitude toward safety," concedes Mr. Elkind, who admits that he never has faced such a "difficult intellectual challenge" in his career as the chairing of the product-safety commission. "Accident prevention is something for the do-gooder, and nobody wants to be called a do-gooder."

But industry and the consumer divide again on the solution to this problem. "There are those who advocate consumer education as a solution to all these problems," says Mr. Kaplan of Consumers Union. "Our reply is that it's often easier to adapt the products than the people."

Further changes are expected on the court front in product safety. About half the states have adopted the strict liability ruling in which a manufacturer's "negligence" in producing a defective product is no longer a question. Mr. Lambert, who can recite a long list of legal defenses still open to manufacturers of unsafe products, counts it an "urgent necessity" that the remaining states follow suit. "It's a battle of the experts, and industry has the experts," he says.

CLASS-ACTION SUITS URGED

Increased use of class-action suits, in which one injured consumer can file suit and recover damages on behalf of many others, is expected. The technique is viewed as especially helpful for small damage claims which private lawyers cannot now afford to take on.

In all, a much stronger role for the government is expected, particularly in education and regulation. Some want to see the National Commission on Product Safety given permanent status. They view its potential role as an advocacy and study group as strengthening other consumer areas.

At any rate its final report, due in June, is expected to include recommendation for a strong government role in standard-setting (possibly requiring pretesting before marketing) and for uniformity in state product-safety law. In the months between, the commission will be paying particularly close attention to the revised standards of the glass bottle industry and to fireproofing of television receivers.

In crusading fashion, the commission has not hesitated to name brands of television sets its research shows most fire prone. Color-TV sets also are being watchdogged for X-ray leakage, in accord with a 1968 law, by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. HEW has authority to set regulations on minimum leakage rates and is expected to do so shortly.

A study done for the commission by an outside firm of technical engineers and released in late January showed that the following manufacturers, in descending order, exceeding the industry average of 0.120 smoke-and-fire incidents per thousand color sets: Lear Siegler (Olympic), Packard Bell, Magnavox, Sylvania, Philco-Ford, and RCA.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—V: WARRANTY WOES BUG BUYER

(By Lucia Mouat)

LOS ANGELES.—At the moment Mrs. Marie Briehl would not mind at all having her 20-year-old stove back. At least it worked. That's more than she has been able to say for her new two-oven, self-cleaning range during most of the eight months that she has had it.

"I never thought to say, 'Hook it onto the gas and see if it works,' " she recalls. "You just assume that with a warranty everything is well. I thought I was getting the best there was on the market."

Today she has no such illusions. Despite her heavy investment, she says she was sent "from pillar to post" in trying to get satisfaction under the terms of her warranty. Finally, the appliance store here where she bought the range grudgingly referred her to the Pennsylvania manufacturer's local service agency.

The repairman has made the trek to Mrs. Briehl's Hollywood home six different times. The range is still not working properly.

She strongly suspects she has either a secondhand or inherently defective model, but she has no way of finding out. The repairman insists that under the warranty his responsibility is limited to trying to make the repairs.

Actually Mrs. Briehl is better off in some ways than many appliance owners. Through letters to the manufacturer, she has at least won agreement to a one-year warranty extension.

NUISANCE HARDLY WORTH EFFORT

Hundreds of others with warranties have had trouble getting repairmen to come at all. Some have had to pay prohibitive prices to ship major appliances back to the factory or nearest service center.

Often they have been told they must pay for the repairs either because the defective part is not covered by the warranty or because they themselves have "abused" the product.

Couple these factors with the business hours of many service agencies (evenings and Saturdays, prime time for most working consumers, are rare), and a warranty sometimes adds up to a nuisance hardly worth the effort.

One Arlington, Va., man, owner of a $12.95 electric toothbrush in need of repair, reasons that in these inflationary times it is cheaper and easier to buy a new one than to take a day off from work to go 10 miles to the nearest agency.

Certainly warranties have never been easy to read. Most run heavy with fine print and legal jargon. And those consumers who have managed to decipher them have found that, like apartment leases, they are usually drafted with an eye to maximum protection and minimum liability for the seller himself.

Indeed, technically, the buyer without a written warranty often is more comprehensively protected by the simple act of purchase. With that he is at least legally entitled to the "implied" warranty of "merchantability" and "fitness."

Mrs. Shirley Goldinger, southern California president of the Association of California Consumers with a degree in consumer economics (and a mother of two), says most warranties are full of "unintelligent gobbledygook" which is "evasive" and "not worth the paper it's printed on."

COMMON COMPLAINT HEARD

As a former employee of a major appliance firm, her interest is the keener. She has testified at State Senate hearings on warranty protection and keeps handy a fistful of examples from her own appliances.

Among them: a warranty for her electric frying pan which leaves off the full identification of the manufacturer, and one for a TV antenna, guaranteeing one year of parts and labor. "I thought I was getting a terrific buy, but the company went out of business, and no one will service its equipment under the warranty."

One of the most common complaints is that warranties cannot speed up delivery on parts.

Donald DaDeppo of Tucson, Ariz., waited three months for replacement of a $1.46 part for his $850 stereo tape recorder. First there was the usual retailer-distributor-manufacturer shuffle, he reports, and then just the waiting. Eventually the part arrived, but Mr. DaDeppo is not much consoled. Is it worth suing for a $1.46 part? he asks.

In effect, explains Addison Mueller, professor of law at the University of California at Los Angeles, the warranty in its present state is simply a promise by the company that the consumer is buying something which will work "sooner or later."

But sometimes there is no substitute for getting one's money back.

Mrs. Bess Myerson Grant, commissioner of New York City's Department of Consumer Affairs, tells of being in the department's touring mobile unit on the lower East Side one day when a woman came in with a $16 blender in his shopping bag.

She explained it was her second in a week, and it was still not working. The manager had refused to give a refund on the first but had offered a replacement of the same brand, adding perceptively, "It probably won't work, either."

This time Mrs. Grant agreed to accompany the woman to the store for a second try at getting her money back. The manager immediately recognized the commissioner and handed over the cash to the shopper. He insisted he had never told her she could not have her money back.

In Mrs. Grant's view, there is no "morality" left in the marketplace if people "deliberately" sell things they know won't last.

Some consumers contend—in a point that never fails to raise the ire of manufacturers—that today's products are designed more with replacement than durability in mind. Firm subscribers to the theory include a Wisconsin man who tried to replace a rubber part missing from his garbage disposal and was told, "Oh, that's four years old—we can't get that anymore."

"Nowadays we just accept the fact that it's cheaper to throw away a toaster than to get it fixed," comments New York's Commissioner Grant. "When my mother bought an appliance, she thought of including it in her will—it became part of the family inheritance."

Manufacturers insist the charge of "planned obsolescence" is ridiculous. Some point to a United States Department of Agriculture study, based on a Census Bureau sampling of more than 17,000 American households, which showed that as of June, 1959, the average product life of a sewing machine was 24 years, while the average electric or gas range would last 16 years.

REASONS FOR PROBLEMS

Obsolescence is caused more by the demand for new, more modern products than anything, argues William S. Comstock, an executive of the three-year-old Association of Home Appliance Manufacturers. He adds that "about 75 percent of the refrigerators we replace, for instance, are still working."

"Ideally," he explains, "all parts should wear out at the same time, but that's technologically impossible and prohibitively expensive. The manufacturer may put in a part he knows will wear out before the rest because it's cheaper to replace than to build to last longer."

Reasons for the growing number of consumer-warranty problems are many.

Industry now is churning out about 96 million home appliances a year, all with increasing gadgetry. This, after all, is the age of the self-defrosting refrigerator, electric can opener, and 16-speed blender. The Association of Home Appliance Manufacturers (AHAM) estimates the average household has a full 18 appliances. But consumers often have several of these out of working order at the same time.

Certainly a key factor in warranty troubles is the haziness of the relative responsibilities of the manufacturer, retailer, distributor, and independent service companies or factory centers. Rates of repair are another bone of contention. Sometimes the manufacturer sends a warranty-payment schedule to the dealer, indicating what he will and won't pay.

SERVICE AGENCIES SET UP

Rarely can the dealer return the product to the factory and get it replaced by a new one. If he gives the customer a replacement on his own, he must get the defective item repaired and sell it (under Federal Trade Commission rules) as "used." The market is slim.

At California Senate hearings on warranty problems last fall, appliance retailer Virgil Gaither told of having to sell a defective refrigerator to five different customers before the manufacturer would take it back and replace it with a functioning model.

These and similar problems have impelled some manufacturers to set up their own service agencies. General Electric Company, the nation's largest producer of household appliances and in the service business on its own for many years, has some 130 service centers around the country, including one for small household appliances in Grand Central Terminal.

The Whirlpool Corporation, which has been paying its dealers full out-of-warranty rates but found that customers were still charged for some items that were under warranty, recently opened a pilot repair agency in Rochester, N.Y., and plans several more.

Although the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) issued guidelines on warranty advertising almost a decade ago, problems of the content of warranties really have only been under bright lights for the past two years or so.

In his consumer message of 1968, former President Johnson set up a task force of the Secretaries of Commerce, and Labor, the chairman of the FTC, and the President's special assistant for consumer affairs to probe the warranty problem and suggest improvements.

After intensive discussion of the problem with industry and consumers and study of some 200 warranties and more than 1,000 letters of complaint to the White House and the FTC, the group issued its report the following January.

Just a few months ago in his consumer message, President Nixon reactivated that task force (with new personnel in the starring roles). That group is expected to report an administration position on warranty legislation by March.

Two major pieces of legislation currently are before Congress. Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D) of Washington and Sen. Frank E. Moss (D) of Utah, two of the capital's longtime "consumer" legislators, refer to their bill as a truth in lending for warranties.

WORD ABUSE CHARGED

No manufacturer, under the bill's provisions, would have to issue a guarantee; but if he did, he would have to follow minimum standards spelled out in the bill. The word "guaranty," which Senator Magnuson says has been "too long twisted, abused, and debased," would be reserved only for performance of electrical, mechanical, and thermal parts of any product.

The bill further proposes that guarantors be encouraged to set up informal procedures for handling disputes and that consumers could seek justice in the courts and recover attorney fees as part of their judgment.

Another bill sponsored by Reps. James G. O'Hara (D) of Michigan and John E. Moss (D) of California would make a guaranty compulsory for any product costing more than $10. If a defective product were not repaired or replaced within a 60-day time limit, the consumer would be entitled to his money back, plus damages, court costs, and attorneys' fees. If the manufacturer were found guilty of violating the act, the consumer would be able to recover from $100 to $5,000.

There are also strong rumblings of action lately at the state level.

California has been considering legislation to force dealers to honor warranties and even perhaps require a bond to ensure their performance. In an unusual attempt to utilize legal expertise on behalf of consumers, a group of lawyers in this state (at the bidding of the Association of California Consumers) has been making a comprehensive review of existing legislation and of California's commercial code to see where fuller consumer-warranty protection is needed.

"You can try to solve client-warranty problems until you're blue in the face," comments Richard Elbrecht, chairman of the group and an attorney with the Legal Aid Society of Santa Clara County, "but if the law itself is unbalanced you can't win. . . . The ship has been leaning toward the seller, and it's time it was put back on an even keel."

OTHER SUGGESTIONS MADE

California is also noteworthy in the warranty field for its six-year-old Bureau of Electronic Repair Dealer Registration. While Connecticut, Indiana, Massachusetts, Louisiana, and several cities now license repairmen in hope of ensuring competency, California is aiming at fraud by requiring registration of shops which repair radios, phonographs, and television sets and compliance with strict rules on advertising, parts, return, invoices, and estimates.

William Hayes, assistant chief of the bureau, points to a thick stack of revoked registrations and explains that the office relies heavily on consumer complaints for its tips. It can run TV sets with controlled defects through repair agencies to check out their honesty.

Estimates are that the bureau, which was nearly scratched in an economy move by Gov. Ronald Reagan at one time, saves Californians some $15 million a year.

Among other suggestions for improved warranty protection for the consumer are establishment of methods for dispute arbitration and a clearer policy on replacement of defective products.

The average consumer with a small appliance which doesn't work has little legal recourse besides "persisting and enduring," argues Professor Mueller. Author of a highly readable article on the subject—"Contracts of Frustration" in the March, 1969, Yale Law Journal—he suggests establishment of neighborhood fact-finding tribunals, preferably open at night, with enough leverage for action.

Simultaneously, Professor Mueller calls for an easing of the FTC definition of "used" in appliances. He distinguishes between actual use over a period of time and the brief time necessary to discover inherent defects.

Business representatives across the nation have been working night and day to ward off the prospect of any new restrictive regulation or legislation.

AHAM and the Gas Appliance Manufacturers Association, which worked with President Johnson's task force, issued a joint response last spring to its suggestions for improvement. Among other things the two have pledged to make more and clearer warranty information available to consumers and to set up a major appliance complaint council of independent consumer "authorities" to audit and suggest improvements in industry treatment of complaints.

In addition, the manufacturing groups have been drawing up guidelines for warranty-advertising practices, for the definition of "authorized service," for the location of model numbers on products, and the like. AHAM also is compiling a directory of parts availability, which will include the whereabouts of parts for discontinued models.

There has been a noticeably strong effort on the part of several manufacturers (AHAM estimates at least three-fourths of its members) to simplify and clarify the meaning of warranties. Whirlpool, Maytag, Corningware, GE, and Sears are among those who have made changes for the better.

CONSUMER MOOD SENSED

Coverage has not necessarily increased—often parts and labor for the first year and parts alone for the second year—but warranties usually are more specific about which parts are covered, and many lack the disclaimer clause which in effect freed the manufacturer from any other obligation to his customer.

There are other signs that manufacturers are well aware of consumer exasperation on the warranty issue.

One of the most widely publicized and commended service efforts is the Whirlpool Corporation's two-year-old "Cool Line." Some 125 customers a day call the Benton Harbor, Mich., toll-free number.

Juel Ranum, chairman of the board of AHAM and Whirlpool's executive director of corporate and public affairs, has monitored many of these calls. He reports that about 50 percent pertain to the location of qualified service representatives. The rest are wondering by and large why they are having trouble with an appliance and what they can do about it.

Whether Congress and the FTC will count the warranty situation improved enough to forgo legislation and further regulation—as the Chamber of Commerce of the United States has urged—remains to be seen. Most estimates are that government action still will come.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—VI: CHARGE NOW, CRY LATER

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—As the cashless society approaches, the need for moderation and integrity in consumer credit faces both lenders and borrowers. This page details key problems as well as reform efforts.)

SEATTLE.—You don't have to listen long to learn why the clean-cut young man in the yellow sport shirt is shifting uncomfortably in the witness chair. It is 10 a.m. in Seattle's King County Courthouse and representatives of half a dozen finance companies are here to prove that he borrowed from them under "fraudulent" conditions. They are contesting his right to file for bankruptcy, charging that he did not list all his debts on the loan applications.

The defendant, a Boeing employee in his early 20's, protests that he was told by the companies to list only his monthly debts. Well, yes (leaning forward to inspect his signature on the applications), he apparently had signed a line below declaring he had listed all his debts, but that just wasn't the way they had explained it to him.

One could see how it all happened. Newly married, he had borrowed first to pay for the refrigerator and the range, using the mortgage on his furniture as security. Meanwhile, the obligations kept piling up: bills from the car-insurance company, the dairy, the Puget Sound Power & Light, the Internal Revenue Service. . . . The more he borrowed, the deeper in he got. Finally bankruptcy looked like the only way out.

MONEY ISN'T EVERYTHING

It's 1970—and the credit is easy. A downtown Detroit billboard, flashing the corner of a charge card, tempts: "Money Isn't Everything." No one misses the message.

From the District of Columbia's 14th Street, where a business school advertises "Everybody Has Credit With Us," to the "easy payment" signs of small-loan companies strung out along San Francisco's South Taylor Street, the theme is the same.

Deluged by mail with unsolicited credit cards, mail-order catalogs, and time-payment offers, the individual is urged to charge everything from his church contributions to his income taxes. With outstanding consumer credit totaling more than $120 billion, the cashless society described in Edward Bellanmy's "Looking Backward" no longer smacks of the impossible.

But for many of the nation's poorest consumers the price of the credit ease comes high. It matters where one lives. On East Harlem's Third Avenue, for instance, furniture and appliance prices are often 150 to 300 percent of what they are in the downtown stores because of credit costs.

On nearby 116th Street, Stephen Press, an articulate young lawyer for the New York Institute for Consumer Education and Development, found it almost impossible to get a loan for his office, even with a government guarantee behind him. "I finally had to go to a high official in Chase Manhattan Bank to get one," he says.

FTC STUDIES THROW LIGHT

The credit plight of the poor is pointed up further by Federal Trade Commission (FTC) studies and such books as David Caplovitz's "The Poor Pay More" and Warren Magnuson and Jean Carper's "The Dark Side of the Marketplace."

Inner-city businesses counter that they must charge more because of high risks and is a highly profitable business straight across income levels. All told, losses for gross consumer credit extended nationally average 2 to 3 percent.

Furthermore, the creditor who lends without fully checking his client's financial ability nevertheless has a strong arsenal of collection weapons at his command.

In most states he can both repossess the goods and sue for the balance of what the borrower owes. In most states a man is bound to pay in full once he signs a contract—even if he never received the goods, if they are damaged, or if he wants to change his mind five minutes after a high-pressure sales talk. Though the truth-in-lending law (federal Consumer Credit Protection Act) says no man may be fired if his wages have been garnisheed for the first time and that no more than 25 percent of his weekly earnings may be taken. Garnishment as a means of collecting debts has been flatly abolished only in Pennsylvania and Texas.

OTHER DEVICES SKETCHED

Some finance companies also resort to a number of other devices to keep the client a captive customer. One way is to refuse to share favorable information on him with credit bureaus. Another is to require weekly payments. Just one slipup could mean legal action which would mar the customer's credit rating for any other store.

Some finance companies do not insist that a borrower list all his debts on a loan application. Often there is space to list only five or six debts. The borrower, admittedly as eager to get the money as the creditor is to lend it, is happy to tailor his story accordingly. This laxness coupled with the creditor's ability to go after the cosigner of the application, results in a powerful tool for creditors to counteract the bankruptcy process.

"I blame easy credit," says Milwaukee attorney Jack N. Eisendrath; he handles many bankruptcy cases but counts bankruptcy by and large a failure in terms of solving a debtor's problems. In most cases, he says, the major debts are soon reaffirmed and/or the creditor uses one of the two legal means mentioned above to prevent bankruptcy.

"All this is such a drain on emotional and mental health," he says. "I find myself on innumerable occasions saying, 'Why did you make the loan?' Once I was told, 'Because we knew the cosigners were good.' The need for profit too often destroys concern for the social effect."

MARKET SOMETIMES MISSED

Some who befriend the nation's poorest consumers argue that credit needs are often most legitimate and that there needs to be a sharp reexamination of credit criteria by banks and other reputable sources.

William F. Willier, director of the National Consumer Law Center in Boston, a legal-service agency funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity, estimates Massachusetts banks miss a good 10 percent of the potential credit market. He tells of sending one ghetto resident, earning $3,200 a year in combined welfare and part-time maid pay, to make the rounds of Boston banks for a $150 loan. She had worked for the same family for 12 years and lived at the same place for nine years. Not one bank would risk lending to her. Her treatment varied from a torn-up application to a lecture on why she did not really need the money.

The law center is currently researching the problem on a broad scale and drafting suggestions it hopes credit bureaus may adopt.

This nation's 2,200 credit bureaus have been under sharp attack recently for some of the criteria used in gathering information. They have been criticized for instance, for keeping an eagle eye out for names of people involved in court proceedings but not following up on the disposition of the cases.

William J. Mangan, general manager of the Credit Bureau of Greater Boston, concedes that this is something of a "flaw." But he says that to remedy it would cost too much in time and money and adds that any creditor can pursue disposition of a case if it is really pertinent to his decision to grant credit.

DIMLY LIT LOFTS DENIED

"Too many people think credit bureaus are dimly lit lofts where a bunch of men with shirt-sleeves, eye-shades, and quill pens decide who gets credit and who doesn't. We don't decide, and our purpose is to see that as many get credit as possible. Many in town on relief can get credit because our records show they can handle it."

Last June Massachusetts passed a strong law to tighten regulation of credit bureaus. Now any Bay State resident denied credit or fired because of his credit rating is to be so notified by the credit bureau, allowed to examine his record, and submit his own version of the story. Also no credit information more than seven years old—with the exception of bankruptcy—can go on his record.

An even stronger federal proposal along these lines passed the Senate last fall and awaits hearings in the House. Sen. William Proxmire (D) of Wisconsin, author of the bill, is also sponsoring legislation to make senders more responsible for issuing unsolicited credit cards. The bill would also increase the supply of reasonably priced credit available to low-income consumers by establishment of federally insured urban-development banks. (Mr. Willier of the National Consumer Law Center says of Senator Proxmire, "Every time I get an idea, he is six months ahead of me.")

CO-OP BUYING AND CREDIT UNIONS

Some consumers have found co-op buying and credit unions helpful in coping with the problem. James Armstrong, director of the South Dakota Credit Union League, reports most of the loans made by three new member unions on Indian reservations are used for medical, clothing, and school expenses. Repayment is often slow, he reports, but there are very few bankruptcies.

Existing credit law, sometimes archaic and traditionally favorable to the lender, varies widely from state to state. Often what protection there is for the consumer has been nullified by creditors' imaginative use of legislative loopholes.

Usury-law ceilings on annual interest rates, for instance, average a low 6 percent, but some credit experts estimate that in the strict sense of the law a whopping 75 percent of the nation's credit transactions are illegal.

Many feel that the disclosure aspect of the federal truth-in-lending law, aimed at sharpening competition in the credit field, is getting similar bypass treatment. Some creditors have tacked on finance charges where there were none before and discontinued old discounts for prompt payment, arguing it is "required" under the new law. The habit has been common enough to cause the FTC to issue a clarifying, condemning statement on the subject last October.

UNIFORM CODE DRAWS FIRE

The hottest point of credit debate in state legislatures at the moment concerns the 127-page Uniform Consumer Credit Code (UCCC), aimed at codifying and updating existing state credit laws. Four years in the drafting by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, it was originally intended as a substitute for the federal law and passed virtually intact in Utah and, with major amendments, in Oklahoma.

Among other things, this highly controversial code would set ceilings on interest rates on small loans (such as 36 percent on the first $300), installment purchases, and revolving charge accounts (such as 24 percent on the first $500). Also, the UCCC would require fuller disclosure of rates, open the credit field to newcomers (in hopes of increasing competition), standardize credit forms, and tighten up on existing collection remedies (a creditor could not both repossess and sue for the balance).

The opposition stems in part from the Consumer Federation of America, the American Bankers Association, finance companies, and labor unions. Business interests are largely concerned about the increased competition expected from the free-entry provision. The consumer and labor groups are concerned that the admittedly high interest ceilings may become the norm and do not want to sacrifice the strength of existing laws in some states for the new.

EMOTION CHARGED

Interviewed in his office just as he returned from rebutting a TV editorial on the subject, William Warren, professor of law at the University of California at Los Angeles and one of the drafters of the code, said that he and his colleagues have been thoroughly surprised "at the kind of attack we've had."

"Emotion has been the key ingredient of the response," he says. "This is not an industry bill, but if anybody thinks they're not going to be in on the drafting, they're living in a dream world."

In his view, the interest ceilings are needed both to protect the man who doesn't realize what rate of interest he pays and also to protect creditors against bad risks.

Those consumer interests which do support the code (largely poverty lawyers) do so mainly because they see it as an improvement on credit legislation in their particular states and because they think it has some chance of passing.

"It's not a black-and-white situation at all," says Benny Kass, head of the ad hoc consumer committee in the District of Columbia and chairman of a new city commission there to study the code. "I'm not an advocate of the code. I'm simply supporting it politically, with amendments, because I think it's better than existing law here in the district."

CAN'T START WITH COMPROMISE

A section-by-section amended version of the code, known as the National Consumer Act, will be introduced in state legislatures this year. It was drafted by the National Consumer Law Center.

"If I've learned one thing from my work with legislatures, it's that you don't start with a compromise," explains the center's Mr. Willier. "UCCC does and it leaves you nowhere to go but backwards."

Credit counselors insist that, even with good laws, they still face a mammoth job educating clients who buy on impulse and think no further ahead than the next monthly payment.

Harry Strain, head of the Consumer Credit Counseling Service in Portland, Ore., one of the more than 100 affiliate counseling groups, nonprofit and industry supported, which have sprung up in the past few years, pins much of the blame on high expectations of his increasingly young clients.

"They look at dad and see he has a TV and two cars in the driveway and they get married and want the same thing yesterday," he says. "The only answer to this whole thing is education. We spend 16 years teaching children how to earn money but we don't spend 16 minutes to teach them how to spend it wisely."

There are also a number of middle-income people who just plain don't know where their money goes or how to shop at all economically. John Gohlston, manager of Milwaukee's Northside Community Credit Union, says a number of his businessmen clients don't know if they are making a profit or not. One contractor on his list so consistently underbids the cost of his jobs that he is often forced to quit at the halfway point.

COLLEGE TEACHERS OWED $28,000

Al Horner, president of Credit Counseling Centers, Inc., in Michigan, one of the most widely respected counseling groups in the country, tells of a college couple among his clients (one teaching economics and the other home economics) who were run out of the last town they taught in by creditors. When they left, they owed $28,000 to 78 creditors!

Mr. Horner says the couple now is on the road to reform, using the counseling service's credit forms in their classes and making no hasty judgments without the agency's advice.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—VII: BUYERS GET SMART

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—Consumer education today, in a step beyond home economics, involves development of intelligent buyers who are aware of the many choices that confront them in the marketplace.)

YONKERS, N.Y.—In suburban Yonkers a class of seniors in Lincoln High School bites into crackers spread with three different brands of grape jelly. A slight majority of the youngsters, who know neither the brands nor the prices, vote the least expensive jelly the most tasty.

"Aside from the fact that you're fed well in this class, what does it mean?" asks teacher Stephen Frey. The hands go up, and the point that price and brand names are not necessarily the clue to performance is driven home.

Meanwhile, in Room 707 of Detroit's rough and sprawling Central High School, where BB-gun holes dot the light fixtures and windows, a student at the teacher's desk details the many assets of a home life-insurance policy.

Linda and Dixon, taking the role of a married couple in the market for insurance, listen nearby. From the back of the room teacher Kathy Meagher, a petite blonde who is very much in control of her classroom, coaches: "Remember, you're working on commission."

Student "salesmen" for other policies take their turn until, finally, Linda announces the family decision: high premiums or not, she wants an endowment policy.

AIDE WARMLY WELCOMED

And in the southeast section of Portland, Oregon, Mrs. Bobbie Gary, a lively mother of four and a nutrition aide for the county extension service, makes her morning rounds of low-income families. First stop is a Mexican family of 10, newly on food stamps. She is warmly welcomed at the door with hugs and kisses. Then Mrs. Gary joins several of the children on the sofa in the sparsely furnished room. After catching up on the news of the family, Mrs. Gary soon tactfully shifts the conversation to a "wonderful" recipe she has for meatless patties—"only 19 cents a serving."

All three examples fit "consumer education," a term as narrow or as broad as anyone wants to define it.

Mrs. Gary's work is part of the relatively new urban thrust of the Cooperative Extension Service, with aides who have known economic hardship themselves doing the teaching.

The Detroit course, called consumer economics, is hardly new. The vocational department's substitute for precollege economics, it dates back to 1933.

The Yonkers course, oldest (1962) and most widely publicized of courses arising out of the "new wave" of consumer education interest, is recognized as an acceptable elective by the high school's business education and social studies departments.

The new interest in the subject stems in part from the carrot of available federal vocational educational funds and from free-wheeling teen-age spending habits. Cars and charge cards are common.

"My students are amazed to find out how much it really costs to finance a car," says Mrs. Marian Woods, a home economist who teaches a family-living course in the Chicago schools. "They don't know from nothin' about these things. One of our girls was going to two dances a week, $2 each time, and was appalled to learn she was spending $200 a year."

A further prod comes from a look at the difficulties the youngsters' parents are having.

Mrs. Meagher, who maintains most youngsters don't know how much it costs to live, tells of one budgeting assignment in which many students asked their parents for "real-life" advice. It caused such chaos among families who didn't know where their money went that Mrs. Meagher was urged to stress that the assignment was strictly "pretend."

SUBJECT CALLED IMPORTANT

Consumer education in its newest sense is far broader than the traditional "stitching and sewing" of old home-economics courses. It is not, as its critics sometimes charge, intended as a forum for a teacher to point out the best buys.

Rather, its proponents insist, its aim is to develop an "intelligent consumer attitude" by exposing students to the range of alternatives he faces in purchasing and managing his money.

"Many home economists would say they teach consumer education because they teach about cooking and clothing," comments Dr. Gordon Bivings, a professor in the University of Missouri's department of family finance and editor of the American Council on Consumer Interests' scholarly Journal of Consumer Affairs.

"But knowing how much money you should devote to clothing and what you're giving up to get it is quite different from buymanship. It's hard to teach and much less tangible, but much more important."

Consumer advocates vary widely in the degree of importance they place on consumer education. Some see it as a good 50 percent of the battle for buyer protection. Others who see legislation as the primary goal argue that the curriculum is crowded enough already and the educational results to date are not that promising.

The Rev. Robert J. McEwan, past president of the Consumer Federation of America and a professor at Boston College, points out that deceptive dance-studio and magazine-subscription practices hit Massachusetts headlines hard a decade ago but that the problem is still present.

"The supply of gullible consumers for these rackets is relatively inexhaustible," he says. "For every one you reach, there are 10 you don't. My theory is that consumer education will pay off in 20 years, but we need some payoff a lot sooner. It could become a smokescreen to divert our attention from the need for immediate action."

David Schoenfeld, who used to teach consumer education at Yonkers' Lincoln High and is now director of educational services at Consumers Union, takes a more sanguine view:

"We need consumer education, if nothing else, for effective use of legislation. It isn't the whole pot by any means but it's one of the essential ingredients. . . . If consumers acted intelligently, the quality and level of competition in our society could be immeasurably improved."

An estimated dozen or more states now are involved in concerted efforts to increase consumer education. Joseph N. Uhl, head of a seven-man Purdue University team which has just finished a one-year study on the status of high-school level consumer education for the United States Office of Education, reports that separate courses are rare.

Most often the subject is woven into existing courses in home economics (most unusual), social studies, business education, driver education, and health classes, and it is most commonly offered to seniors.

ILLINOIS REQUIRES COURSES

The only state with a law making consumer education a mandatory part of the curriculum is Illinois. Passed in late 1967, it stipulates that students in grades 8–12 take courses which include but are not limited to installment purchasing, budgeting, and price comparisons.

Cecil Partee, author of the law and a state Senator who carefully courted consumers, businessmen, and school officials to get it passed, calls its language "abominably simple."

"School people, understandably, have a real aversion to being told what to teach," he says. "I wanted to give them as much latitude as possible, to give a feeling of opening new vistas rather than of pinning down."

The Illinois Department of Public Instruction has issued a curriculum guide but implementation is still very much in the pilot stage.

Indeed, consumer-education courses are far more common in New York State (an estimated 300 high schools are involved) where the state department of education merely smiles benignly on the idea and supplies anyone interested with a hefty 230-page curriculum guide.

Certainly a major stumbling block in the spread of academic consumer education is the dearth of qualified and enthusiastic teachers. The subject is often handed to a young teacher already trying to juggle two or three subjects other than her own specialty. Many feel overwhelmed by the scope of projects to be covered.

"Too many people assume anyone can teach this subject because everyone is a consumer," comments Dr. Thomas Brooks, a professor of family economics at the University of Connecticut. "Very few really know the ins and outs."

In Illinois, the teacher problem has led to a flurry of in-service workshops and a suggestion from state officials that schools turn to the specialization allowed by team teaching or call in outside resource people.

A bottleneck second only to teacher training in this field is the shortage of really good teaching materials. Probably handiest all-round reference as to what is available is the bibliography put out by the President's Committee for Consumer Interests.

Currently business provides the bulk of consumer-education material. An estimated 500 sponsors are involved. Some of the material is of fairly high academic caliber. Often the line is hazy between propaganda information, and education. Teachers, everwary of the distinction, will often assign the materials to the wastebasket if in doubt.

"Teachers haven't been articulate about what they want in industry publications," asserts a National Association of Manufacturers spokesman.

Most sought-after materials are those put out by trade associations and foundations (generally slim on brand names) and by individual companies, such as J. C. Penney's and Procter & Gamble, which play down their own involvement, relatively speaking.

"It's natural for enlightened business to want to provide information," says Thomas B. Hanchett, vice-president of the Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Company, a firm which discreetly mentions its name only once in a series on credit and budgeting it supplies free of charge to Chicago schools.

"We've tried to make ours as objective as possible. It's bound to have a certain bank flavor since that's the only place you can get checking accounts, but we point out such things as the higher return on savings available from a savings and loan institution than from a bank. We'd be foolish to hide it—it's in every ad in the papers."

In some cities business interests have taken the initiative to supply both the materials and the speakers in consumer-education programs.

EDUCATION PLANS PREFERRED

In St. Paul, Minn., for instance, the chamber of commerce, credit bureau, and better business bureau approached school officials in 1968 to launch a comprehensive five-topic program. Starting with three high schools last year, the program now reaches all nine in the city.

At a recent noontime class in the Johnson High School music room, youngsters did not appear too fascinated to have the 10 rules of buymanship spelled out for them, including such maxims as never shop when tired. But they perked up considerably when their turn came to ask questions about car insurance and warranties.

Another educational program started on business initiative is the National Foundation for Consumer Credit's eight-week course for low-income consumers. It began on a pilot basis for District of Coluumbia residents (largely welfare recipients) last spring. The free course covers the gamut from financial planning to comparative shopping and is only disappointing to some in that a graduation certificate is not a ticket to an acceptable credit rating at area stores.

When it comes to consumer protection, businessmen much prefer the educational to the legislative route. However, their definition of consumer education often differs from that of the consumer spokesman.

Businessmen can match every consumer "horror" story with one or two of their own. They can tell you about the ladies who write in to order new "felt mats" (lint residue) for their driers, who try to cook steaks in the storage drawers of their electric ovens, and think paprika "tenderizes" chicken.

Then there are some who return goods bought two years ago from a department store, and who call the serviceman when the only problem is that they forget to put in the plug or turn "on" the switch.

In such a context, consumer education can mean giving the buyer an appreciation of the complexity of the marketplace and some insight into how it operates. In that sense a movie or pamphlet (such as many businesses churn out) tracing the development of the tomato to catsup, for instance, becomes perfectly appropriate.

As some businessmen see it now, much of what currently passes for consumer education is really more mistrust than information. Some consumer advocates agree.

"When there's something to be taught, the schools should help teach it," says Robert J. Klein, economics editor of Consumer Reports. "Right now they're teaching mainly misinformation and skepticism—perhaps even cynicism."

One of the problems that most perplexes those interested in consumer education is getting through to the low-income consumer. Though prone to brand-name buying and probably the most victimized by deceptive practices, he often appears the least interested and least affected by suggestions for improvement. Many say the resistance has its degree of logic.

"There are problems—like not having enough money to buy a two-pound sack of sugar even though it's more economical than the small size," says Robert A. Murphy, principal of Chicago's Hilliard Adult Education Center.

GREAT EDUCATIONAL POTENTIAL

Since statistics have it that low-income families watch twice as much TV as their suburban counterparts, that media is viewed as having great educational potential for this group. University extension division in Missouri, California, and Connecticut have been particularly active on this score.

The Connecticut Cooperative Extension Service sponsors closed-circuit TV programs in credit and consumer laws for close to 200 neighborhood poverty leaders in extension centers around the state. These, in turn, pass along the information to their own block clubs or other community groups.

Dr. Elsie Fetterman, associate professor of family economics at the University of Connecticut and the one who did much of the program drafting, counts it a strong success. She is gearing now to volunteer her time to work with factory workers, through closed-circuit TV, with the same message.

However successful the isolated examples, most who watch over consumer education shake their heads as to the best method for success with the nation's poorest consumers.

"We just don't know that much about motivation," says Karl W. Kepner, Purdue agricultural economist. "Maybe the final conclusion will be that you can't do that much in education for the blue-collar worker—that you have to put the emphasis on protection instead."

Popularity of consumer periodicals, such as Kiplinger's "Changing Times," U.S. Consumer, Credit Union National Association's Everybody's Money, Consumer Bulletin, and Consumer Reports remains as proof that there is a large group of consumers which does care and wants more information.

Consumer Reports, which combines product-testing information with strong editorial views on consumer legislation and its effects, has doubled circulation in the last five years, and Consumers Union (CU), its publisher, has recently opened a Washington office.

Many consumers would not think of making a substantial purchase without consulting this monthly magazine. Its strength is seen in its thoroughness. The visitor to CU's busy Mount Vernon, N.Y., laboratories is apt to see everything from raincoat swatches being tested for fiber strength, waterproofing and dozens of other criteria to a disposal grinding away on different ingredient mixes, from olive pits to 2-inch bones. Any product which fares poorly is usually tested a second and/or third time, using other samples.

"We can't afford to make a mistake," explains Frank Pollack, an assistant to CU's president. "The most important thing we have is our credibility."

As consumer periodicals continue to gain and consumer education makes new inroads in the schools, some consumer advocates now look to the establishment of local consumer centers at which any buyer with interest may pick up a wide variety of consumer-education materials. He may even get some impartial advice on which are the best—not just the least ethical—of the local service representatives to patronize.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—VIII: IS THE CUSTOMER STILL RIGHT?

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—Many businessmen look upon the consumer movement as a trumped-up issue. Yet in a number of ways business now courts customers more warmly than ever. Some see this response as one of enlightened self-interest.)

COLUMBUS, OHIO.—The tags dangling from the percolators, blenders, and steam irons drew passing glances from shoppers at Lazarus, a Federated department store. Some even paused to inspect them—learning how many speeds each blender had and how much liquid it would hold. But just how crucial the tags were in their buying decisions even the shoppers may be hard put to measure. Still, Federated Department Stores, Inc., which launched the three-month, three-appliance experiment in standardized point-of-sale information, is now doing its best by mail and telephone questionnaires to evaluate the results.

The Lazarus experiment, an adaptation of Britain's "Tel-Tag" system, is one of dozens of visible business efforts to respond constructively to the consumer movement—and to act before legislation forces it.

The head-in-the-sand approach is no more, even though some businessmen are still convinced that consumerism is largely a trumped-up political issue which will soon fade. Many would agree with the Californian who wrote Mrs. Virginia Knauer, Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs, that consumers have only their own "stupidity" to blame for their problems. He wrote her that he does not want the added tax burden of consumer protection legislation.

Most businessmen now are at least aware of the problem. Some have shifted noticeably from the automatic reflex of stepped-up public relations to a considerably more sensitive reaction.

RESENTMENT FELT BY SOME

Mixed with such positive efforts, however, is a tinge of resentment that those customers they have been serving well for years, thank you, have been suddenly "discovered" by "outsiders." To some, the very word "consumer" is objectionable.

"It has a dramatic, negative connotation," argues Richard Maxwell, president of the National Better Business Bureau. "The buyer is pictured as taken advantage of by the unseen, uncaring establishment. . . . To business, he is still a customer."

At the moment, many businesses feel grossly misunderstood. Somehow, they reason, they have failed to communicate to their customers and must now suffer the consequences, however unjustified.

Businessmen, almost to a man, are indignant about what they think consumerism has done to their image. They feel that good and bad have been blackened by the same, damaging paintbrush. Indeed, some consumer advocates concede that a failure on the part of many consumers to distinguish at least between the relatively good and the relatively bad is a prime factor in the unity of business ranks on the subject. It is well known that retailers and manufacturers, as well as the ethical and the dishonest in business, have their differences; usually, however, in the face of consumer criticism or impending legislation, they stand as a united front.

LAZARUS OPEN TO EXPERIMENT

Much of the new business effort is in increased and clearer point-of-sale information.

The Lazarus experiment, admittedly limited in scope, was prompted in part by discussions between Federated officials and Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal (D) of New York, who has a provision for a feasibility study of the "tel-tag" idea in his bill proposing a "Consumer Affairs Department." Another key factor was the receptivity of Charles Y. Lazarus, and president of the American Retail Federation.

Lazarus officials see tagging as primarily the manufacturer's rather than the retailer's responsibility. Their intent in supporting the project was simply to get something startled, perhaps encouraging a more scientific look at the concept.

There is activity on the manufacturing front. North Carolina's Southern Furniture Manufacturers Association is putting firm stress on its members for more wearability, serviceability, and cleaning information. The Association of Home Appliance Manufacturers makes specific similar suggestions in its new guidelines for members. Whirlpool, one of these, tags its products with yellow "buy guides" and has produced a 90-minute musical—called Care-a-Van—on how to buy and care for appliances.

SOME EFFORTS NOTABLE

Some companies are making modest efforts to help low-income consumers. Montgomery Ward & Co. had a two-month special fabric sale in Detroit's inner city (and claimed they lost money in the process). Also, in a new national program in several cities, Ward is preparing to extend credit to 3,000 National Welfare Rights Organization recipients on revolving credit charge accounts of $100 limits each.

Much of the new awareness is at the executive level. E. B. Weiss, vice-president of Doyle Dane Bernbach, Inc., considered one of business' more "progressive" thinkers on consumer matters, says consumerism is being accepted at the top as "a new dimension of corporate social responsibility." But he adds "that a tearful defense of the status quo" still prevails at the marketing level.

A Chicago legal firm, a group of 24 businessmen headed by Gordon Sherman, head of Midas-International, is being funded in the public interest by business. The three-man legal staff has filed air pollution suits against Commonwealth Edison Company and the United States Steel Corporation, among others.

Many businesses show their concern structurally by setting up special consumer departments and establishing consumer advisory councils. Some put out educational materials and sponsor research and TV efforts.

COMMUNICATIONS GAP TACKLED

Local chambers of commerce have been holding business-consumer dialogue meetings in the past year in an attempt to bridge the communications gap. Significantly, an estimated one-third of those attending the recent consumer assembly in Washington (a consumer-oriented meeting if there ever was one) were business representatives. Some of these have joined various state consumer groups.

Now that industry is so carefully avoiding confrontation, some consumers are becoming concerned that, if they are not alert, the consumer movement may simply be "co-opted" and absorbed by business interests. They point to consumer advocate Ralph Nader, who says he was asked by General Motors in January, 1966, to "come over and put some of your ideas to use."

Similarly, there is concern that in the rush to set up government consumer commissions at the local and state level, business is being overrepresented.

Mrs. Esther Shapiro, consumer affairs representative for the Michigan Credit Union League, who characterizes herself as a 'token' consumer on several such commissions, argues business has no place on a consumer committee. "There's just a difference in the philosophy of approach," she says.

REGULATION RESISTED

Now, more than ever, business resists government regulation and legislation. If not openly opposed, many businessmen simply remain mutely neutral. Although such legislation is aimed at the dishonest few, all others feel they are often hurt in the process.

As evidence that no more laws are needed, businessmen point to their own efforts at self-regulation.

Oldest and best known example is the national system of Better Business Bureaus which dates back to 1912. Some consumers turn to the BBBs almost automatically for help when trouble occurs.

Caliber of bureaus ranges widely from city to city. Many are understaffed and have short enough telephone hours to discourage some consumers from calling. This reporter had difficulty in several cities. Also, as bureau staffers readily admit, the BBB's strongest weapon is publicity (which some consumers feel they use with too much discretion).

"You can do a great deal in this business by just publicizing gimmicks," comments Lyle Janz, head of the BBB in Portland, Ore., one bureau credited with being frank in its radio, TV, and office bulletins about which businesses are not reputable. "We don't hesitate to name names if we feel it's justified. The best defense against libel is the truth."

ADVERTISING ROLE CRUCIAL

Although there is some feeling among bureau personnel that new governmental and voluntary consumer units are intruding on their job, most make it plain and clear that the bureaus were largely started by advertising clubs and that truth in advertising remains a prime goal.

Mrs. Knauer says she likes to spread the word of the good work some businesses are doing and to throw out a challenge for action to business groups she addresses. Soon after getting her way in restricting fat content of hot dogs to 30 perecnt, she issued such a challenge. She reports that John Morrell & Co. was the first to respond by putting out a whole sandwich line that was only 12 to 14 percent fat.

A number of factors keep business from doing more than it does:

Paramount is the fact that social improvement is just not that profitable and profit is business's No. 1 interest.

There is concern—though some critics assume it may be simply a convenient excuse for inaction—about violation of antitrust laws.

Also many businessmen say they are subject to the censure of their colleagues if they pinpoint unethical practices of others or try to upgrade standards on their own.

HEARING AIDS CITED

John B. Flowers, for example, owner of the Tri-State Hearing Center in downtown Columbus, Ohio, fought a lonely battle to tighten standards in the hearing aid business. Many people came to the center who had paid as much as $1,500 for hearing aids from door-to-door salesmen—far too high a price.

First Mr. Flowers complained to the local Better Business Bureau and says he was told that complaints from one dealer against another were not accepted. Next he wrote to the state attorney general's office and got a "political" reply.

Finally he got some help from the City Commissioner on Consumer Protection and began to work for a law to upgrade standards of the profession. The law was passed and will go into effect in July, but Mr. Flowers notes that one of his competitors spent $30,000 to fight it and the state trade association in that field remained firmly opposed until it was apparent the law would pass.

UPGRADING ETHICS

Some companies have tried to upgrade ethics in their field by direct visits to other companies.

In door-to-door selling, for instance, where many instances of consumer fraud occur, Avon Products takes the position that unethical practices are even more harmful to honest business than to the consumer. Robert R. McMillan, a lawyer who directs Avon's government and public affairs department, says company representatives have visited firms whose actions were detrimental to its own. Also, Avon has given a no-strings-attached $3,500 grant to a Connecticut educational TV experiment in consumer education.

There are those who think business has come a long way in the past year or two in responding to consumer concerns. One of them is Mrs. Knauer. On the whole, she says she is "impressed" with the "intelligent" response.

"To get them to do anything at all, it has to be enlightened self-interest," she says. "It's sort of the American way of life. I think they should have maximum encouragement and publicity."

Other consumer advocates argue that only the surface has been scratched. Consumer advocate Nader, conceding that some businessmen have "started making some interesting speeches," says that essentially "nothing has changed." In his view business is simply pouring more money into its lobbying efforts—"the whole theory is to keep one step ahead of the truth seeker," he says.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—IX: VOLUNTARY ACTION GETS RESULTS

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—"They kick up a lot of sand and get people listening," says one expert on the subject of voluntary consumer groups. If still short on members, these activist consumer organizations are proving more and more to be long on results.)

PORTLAND, ORE.—"Nobody ever dreamed we could fight the banks and win," said Mrs. Jan Rathe, executive secretary of the Oregon Consumer League, as she poured tomato sauce into the skillet on her kitchen stove. Tonight she was putting a little of her home-economics training to use by fixing her family of seven an economical—"but tasty"—kidney creole.

She was recalling the fight three years ago in this state over a bill proposed by the major banks to raise credit-card interest rates from 16 to 18 percent. League and labor-union members in all parts of the state let go with a concentrated letter-writing and legislator-buttonholing campaign that saw the bill defeated by a dramatic margin.

Such clear-cut victories are still rare in the annals of the more than 30 statewide voluntary consumer organizations around the country.

But the Oregon Consumer League, with its 300 individual and 50 organizational members, is typical of many in the character and scope of its efforts. Its activities range from lobbying and food-price surveys to newsletter publication and work with state officials on a consumer-education program for the schools. More unusually, the league has drafted (and received a $30,000 grant for) a model-city proposal to open a branch office in Portland's Albina section. And it holds a once-a-month "sound off" session for anyone who wants to air a grievance or share consumer information.

IT'S LIKE GOING TO SCHOOL

Like most of her counterparts, Mrs. Rathe gives heavily and freely of her time. Fortunately she likes it: "It's like going to school, an education in itself." Only a handful of executive secretaries in consumer groups are paid—largely by small matching grants offered by New York's Consumers Union. Headquarters of the Oregon League is high in the west hills of Portland in the Rathe family den. The latest addition on the desk piled high with papers is a green telephone specially installed to handle league calls.

State voluntary consumer groups range in age from the 70-year-old New Jersey Consumers League (formed to fight for fair labor standards) to an Iowa group which is less than a year old. Some sprouted three or four years ago under the direct prodding of Howard Frazier, then director of field operations on the staff of Mrs. Esther Peterson, first of the presidential consumer advisers. Many state groups are adding city chapters, while a few city groups (such as the Consumer Assembly of Greater New York) are slowly moving to statewide status.

These are the groups of citizen-consumers which Mrs. Virginia H. Knauer, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs, refers to affectionately as "the climatemakers—they kick up a lot of sand and get people listening."

VOCAL MINORITY CHARGED

Some do not view them quite so charitably. Critics charge that members are few, yet act as if they had been tapped to speak for the many. Also, they argue, such groups are often stronger on zeal and righteous indignation than in their homework and in a sense of "political realism."

It is true that membership is a touchy subject. But several groups have more than 1,000 individual and 100 organizational members. "If you could get 25,000 members the legislators would really listen," insists James Webster, past president of the South Dakota Consumers League.

In the democratic spirit of consumerism several dozen members are often placed on the groups' boards of directors, a factor which encourages membership but sometimes inhibits action. All consumers are not necessarily united on the issues. The board of the Association of Massachusetts Consumers, Inc., for instance, reached an impasse not long ago on the subject of a beef boycott and on a stand on auto-insurance reform. One board member, who felt keenly on the anti-ballistic-missile controversy, managed to squeeze a short editorial on the subject into the group's consumer newsletter, much to the consternation of his colleagues, who learned of it only after the fact.

QUALITY VERSUS QUANTITY

"People on the board are selected with great care," says Miss Velia DiCesare, president of the group, "but everyone is an independent thinker."

In general, say leaders of these voluntary groups, the quality of the membership—lawyers, legislators, professors, labor-union members, housewives—makes up for quantity at this stage. All, they say, do the best that time and budget limitations allow.

However valid the criticism, these voluntary groups provide plenty of graphic evidence of the grass-roots, activist nature of the consumer revolt in 1970.

Drop in on Mrs. Sylvia Siegel, executive director of the Association of California Consumers, and you may find her deep in a telephone conversation with a woman who, following all the standard procedures, is unable to get her new car in working order. "Tell the dealer," suggests Mrs. Siegel, "you'll put a sign on the car saying, 'This is a lemon, purchased at. . .' You'll get some fast action."

Or, if you should drop in on Dr. Currin V. Shields, president of the Arizona Consumers Council and director of the Institute of Government Research at the University of Arizona, you may find him comparing the high price of milk in various Tucson supermarkets. Likely as not, in the process he may buy a carton of filled milk (still labeled "milk" and still in the dairy case despite new restrictive legislation) to take as an exhibit of violation to the dairy commissioner.

The scope of interests of any voluntary consumer group is vast. Even for the group that started on a single issue, interests now range from moving charges and health insurance to taxes and pollution. The idea is to keep those new members coming in and give the organization some lasting power after an individual issue has been successfully dealt with.

However, most groups are beginning to pinpoint priorities in the interests of concerted action. The Oregon League, for instance, divides consumer legislative issues into "push, pull, and praise" categories and lends its degree of support accordingly.

Certainly state legislation ranks high on any consumer group's priority list. The key issue last year and again this year is the Uniform Consumer Credit Code (UCCC), which the Consumer Federation of America (CFA), umbrella organization of the voluntary groups, strongly opposes. The federation keeps members apprised of the best rationale and tactics to use in work against such legislation. So far the code, also firmly opposed by labor groups, has passed in only two states.

MINNESOTA HEARINGS SCORED

Money and time are tight for lobbying and testifying for consumer legislation. Mrs. Tobey Lapakko, president of the Minnesota Consumers League and one who holds a full-time job in another field, points out that, in the last session of her state's Legislature hearings were limited to one hour each and few, if any, were held in the evening.

"It's unfair," she says. "Business can afford to send someone during the day, but most consumers have other jobs. And their point of view is just as important."

In legislative fights, well-established labor groups are fast becoming an invaluable ally for consumers. It was the Minnesota Federation of Labor (AFL–CIO), for instance, which last year worked hard—and successfully—to defeat the UCCC and to get an improved wage-garnishment law in that state.

"Years ago the labor movement was interested only in the wages and working conditions of its members," says David Roe, president of the federation, "but it soon found high interest rates and sales taxes could eat up any wage increase. Now if it's got anything to do with the consumer, we want to be involved. We're in it up to our ears."

Though labor groups have more clout than their consumer counterparts, most still cannot match the budget that business can put forth. Thus a consumer victory with labor effort is still impressive. The shock waves among business interests in the state of Washington are still reverberating from the referendum a few years ago which rolled back maximum retail credit interest from 18 to 12 percent.

It all started with a Washington State Labor Council petition for such a referendum. Joe Davis, red-haired council president, led the signature drive which netted 147,000 names. He reports that banks made dire predictions that they would be forced out of business and waged a $500,000 (compared to $50,000 from labor) campaign to defeat the move.

While Mr. Davis is not jubilant—"nothing is permanent, it can be changed back any time"—he points out that consumers (and any group with similar interests) have the referendum-initiative route open to them in 21 states.

Legislators have mixed feelings about the strength of consumer groups. One in California says he is far more interested in labor's position on a bill than in that of one of the "fly by night" consumer groups. Another in Illinois insists that the housewife who presses for action "doesn't even know you're up for reelection, but business never forgets."

LEAGUE SUPPORT WELCOMED

Certainly the consumer-minded legislator is happy to have some vocal support. Don S. Willner, first president of the Oregon League and a state senator who had frequently sponsored consumer legislation in the past ("usually passed in weakened version and with colossal effort," he recalls), was delighted to have league support against the bill to raise bank interest rates on credit in 1967.

"Admittedly this was kind of a negative victory; it's easier to defeat something than to pass it," he says. "But it had been awfully lonely being a consumer spokesman in the Legislature until then. And league members really worked their heads off to defeat that bill."

In the Arizona Legislature, Sen. Clovis Campbell, who happens to be a vice-president of the Arizona Consumers Council, credits that group with passage of a clean-bedding bill which stipulates that pillow stuffing from sanitoriums and convalescent homes be sanitized and accurately labeled for any resale. "The bill was sponsored by minority members of the lower chamber, and normally that kind of legislation just doesn't move," says Senator Campbell. "The bill was virtually dead until the letters from league members started coming in."

However weak some consumer groups may be and however feeble their lobbying efforts, most involved feel even their presence counts for something.

In South Dakota the telephone company planned to raise rates without a hearing. The newspapers and the South Dakota Consumers League got wind of it and publicized the facts. A hearing was announced shortly thereafter, and in the end the telephone company did not get its full request.

"We were the only people that objected, and if we didn't save people any money, at least we made them aware someone was watching," says Mr. Webster, past president of the group.

With an eye to compliance, members of the Illinois Federation of Consumers have sent questionnaires to school boards around the state asking them what if anything they have done toward enforcing the law which makes consumer education mandatory for grades 8 to 12.

There are those in the consumer movement who feel the legislative emphasis has been much too strong.

LETTER WRITING HARD TO SPARK

"The real higher-ups who could provide leadership are interested only in legislation," comments Mrs. Sandra Helmick, who edits the Missouri Association of Consumers newsletter and works with a chapter of the group in Columbia, Mo.

"It's pretty hard to get housewives fired up about writing their congressmen," she says. "They want to get out in the marketplace and confront the merchant. They want to picket and boycott and do all sorts of irrational things. I don't belittle the need for legislation, but there needs to be something else to get these people excited."

The reason that most consumer groups find themselves "goading the government" full time these days is because there is so much "catching up" to do, counters Mrs. Helen Nelson, vice-president of CFA and executive secretary of the Illinois Federation of Consumers. "There hasn't been anything done on the consumer's behalf for so long," she charges, "and the leadership understands it's in government that the rules of the game are made."

Nonetheless, in her view, consumer interests far outrange government concern and control, and she predicts that in the long run citizen consumer groups will prove much more valuable than government consumer groups.

Certainly one thing that interests all consumers is prices. Most groups engage in some price surveys, however sporadic. Rarely nowadays do they boycott as a follow-up. Part of the reason is the knowledge that the effects would probably be short term.

Other tactics are available. The Lousiana Consumer League frankly admits it builds its membership by making available a regularly published survey of drug and food prices. A St. Louis housewives' group, concentrating on food prices, has held "buy-ins" at stores with the lowest prices. Arizona's Dr. Shields, who perhaps is the only consumer with a 700-year-old saguaro cactus in his backyard, has had his league members embarked on surveys of both toy and food prices. He is convinced that supermarket chains are using Arizona as a test case to see how high they can administer the prices. Bread and milk prices, he says, have taken such a uniform jump he has been considering testing the state's strong antitrust statutes with a class-action suit on behalf of consumers.

TEN PICKETS AT A TIME

As low-income consumer groups become more common, however, boycotting may become fashionable once again. It is the prime tactic, once discussion with the merchant has failed, of Philadelphia's Consumer Education and Protection Association (CEPA). Using only 8 to 10 pickets at a time, the group has managed to recover more than $200,000 due consumers, according to Max Weiner, CEPA education director and editor of its newspaper.

As they grow, voluntary consumer groups are being pressed to handle individual consumer complaints. Philadelphia's CEPA exists for that purpose alone. To some extent groups in Virginia, Arizona, Wisconsin, and the District of Columbia, among others, are doing it. The potential for this function is much greater for a local chapter or a consumer group, particularly if complaints can be publicized. For a state group, Mrs. Erma Angevine, executive director of the Consumer Federation of America, likens it to "holding a finger in the dike." In her view most groups have neither the staff nor the power to do an adequate job.

For all consumer groups, membership and money remain critical problems. Every group this reporter visited was embarked on an intensive drive for new members.

"Our membership is growing fantastically and we aren't working that hard at it," reports Mrs. Diane Hostetter, president of the Flagstaff chapter of the Arizona Council. In addition to welcoming complaints and conducting price surveys, this group is considering prodding merchants to establish a code of ethics in hopes of improving the city's tourist reputation. Lasting power and some continuity of direction are considered crucial in gaining legislative respect.

"I think the immediate problem is with the political forces," says Mrs. Angevine. "They have to overcome the attitude that consumers aren't important—that they're 'just housewives.' Everybody's a consumer."

Some, like Senator Willner in Oregon, are convinced that the day of such recognition is fast approaching.

"The people crying against pollution are no longer considered antibusiness, as they were five years ago," he notes. "We won't see the same thing on consumerism until it becomes a 'good guy,' too. But it's making progress."

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—X: SHOULD CITIES "RESCUE" THE CONSUMER?

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—People on both sides of the consumer issue see New York City's Department of Consumer Affairs as a bellwether organization. It has power to get things done for the consumer. But some question the "balkanization" of consumer laws that results from activist city agencies.)

NEW YORK.—Behind-the-desk administration is not for Mrs. Bess Myerson Grant. She wants to be where the action is—and action at her New York City Department of Consumer Affairs is ample and everywhere at once.

Described as "a real can-do and does-do" person by former presidential consumer adviser Mrs. Esther Peterson, "the commissioner" (as all of her staff calls Mrs. Grant) may be found on a typical day weighing chickens in a Brooklyn market (for possible shortweighting violation), cruising around Harlem to check on advertising and pricing practices, or perhaps leaving the department's "consumobile" on the Lower East Side with a resident who wants to show her a new rug that the seller refuses to take back.

Or, on a more legalistic day, Mrs. Grant might be in Washington testifying against the administration's class action bill or announcing in New York, at a hearing of her own department, new tightened restrictions on used-car dealers in the city.

"I don't think I could function and get the kind of nourishment I need in this work if I were in a stratum that had no contact with people," she commented during a luncheon interview at her Manhattan apartment last month.

Even there, as this reporter was let in the back door to the Grants' blue and white kitchen, the commissioner was busily taking notes and, with the indispensable help of the "hold" button, trying to juggle three or four phone calls at once.

She briefed a new employee on what his job would entail, checked in on a departmental hearing ("pretty dull, huh?"), explained to an old friend why she hadn't had time to get over to see her, and politely but firmly "turned off" the salesman for a bicycle exerciser.

In almost a year on the job, Mrs. Grant has proved to be far more intense and concerned about her mission than most of New York's eight million consumers expected from a former "Miss America" beauty queen. While she stresses she has not allowed her work to become a 24-hour-a-day job, she admits: "I've never worked so hard in my life."

Many observers of the consumer movement feel some of the most dramatic and innovative consumer action is taking place in the cities. A consumer-oriented city council, with the right kind of mayoral and grassroots support, can leave a conservative state legislature far behind in terms of consumer protection. New York city provides a prime case in point.

PIONEERING ENTHUSIASM

Currently only a handful of cities have such governmental units—usually an extension of weights and measures and licensing divisions and usually catering heavily to consumer complaints on the local level—but the potential in these urban times is viewed as great.

Commissioner Grant herself says she would like to see a network of such agencies around the country and would welcome "a web" of individual consumer divisions even within New York's city boroughs.

As the most talked-about governmental consumer unit in the country, next to the President's Committee on Consumer Interests, the New York department at 80 Lafayette Street, with 3,500 employees and a $4 million annual budget, has wasted no time in setting an exemplary record of action in its year and a half on the job.

Most of the staff is young and imbued with the same kind of pioneering enthusiasm as the commissioner, a fact which has led to some paternal criticism from longer established, slower moving agencies and, of course, from local businessmen.

Indeed, the department's official motto of "Wise up," a message to consumers stamped on thousands of yellow buttons, might be more aptly directed to local businessmen, who have been feeling the heat to the point of becoming the department's staunchest critics.

The City Council's passage of the Consumer Protection Act (CPA), which in effect elevates the department to a small-scale Federal Trade Commission, is viewed as the major accomplishment. "We were told it was never going to be introduced and would never get through," says the still slightly amazed commissioner.

Phillip G. Schrag, chairman of the department's consumer advisory council and the young lawyer who drafted the proposal, describes it as a combination of the Uniform Consumer Sales Practices Act and court class action bills—"Two of the best consumer proposals around." With the CPA, New York now can sue on consumers' behalf and recover collective damages.

"I think it's the strongest consumer-protection law in the country at any jurisdictional level," says Mr. Schrag. "Other cities will be looking to it as a model."

"Fraud has been against the law for generations," adds Simon Lazarus, young Yale Law School graduate who is executive director of the Department of Consumer Affairs, "but this law makes it also unprofitable."

MERCHANTS PROTEST

However, the department action which has brought the strongest business retaliation to date is its controversial decision to require unit pricing on more than a half-dozen grocery items ranging from carbonated soft drinks and paper napkins to cereal and bread.

The regulation was originally slated for effect last November, but a loud protest, largely from the New York State Food Merchants Association, led to a delay in the starting date to Feb. 20. The Mayor was bombarded with letters from supermarket executives and standardized postcards sent by 10,000 grocers in the city complaining that they would be driven out of business by the action and that the regulation "defrauds" the people it purports to protect.

"All of a sudden, everyone in the supermarkets was 'hard-core unemployed' and didn't know how to count or divide by two," says Mrs. Grant of the complaints and the delay.

Nonetheless, over the dire predictions of the Food Merchants Association that it will add $50 million a year to the grocery bill of New York shoppers, the regulation went into effect last week. Methods of posting the information are flexibly up to the retailer, and Commissioner Grant is confident that in the long run "everyone will use it."

"We don't say people have to buy cheaper but they at least ought to know which brands are cheaper," says Henry J. Stern, a lawyer who serves as the department's associate commissioner. "The advantage of unit pricing is that it will end package trickery—the whole panoply of false bottoms, slack fill, the shattered ounce, and the minidecimal."

The success or lack of it in the New York experiment will be closely watched. Even other consumer leaders are happy it is New York and not they taking the action. "Mrs. Grant really stuck her neck out on this one," says Sidney Margolius, writer and consultant on consumer problems. "Believe me, it was a very brave, pioneering thing for her to do. It's easy to say this is a federal or a state problem."

Handling consumer complaints is considered a most important function of the New York department. All new employees spend a week or two of their training handling them.

The "consumobile" rolls into low-income neighborhoods complete with loudspeaker and equipment for recording individual complaints. Some who turn out are given copies of the department's 25-page pamphlet on how to sue in small claims court.

Also, at the department headquarters, six specially designated telephones manned by volunteers take in about 400 calls a day. When lines are busy or after hours, the consumer can leave a name and number and be called back.

However, even Commissioner Grant, who would like the department to serve as a "people's lobby," is the first to concede that the consumer is not always right.

"I'm terribly conscious of the fact that it's easy to flail out and hit everybody," she says. "That's simple, and it's not the way it should be done. It would be terribly unfair. Whenever we've accused a particular area of business of less than ethical conduct, the evidence has been there."

But neither she nor her staff hold out much hope for voluntary self-regulation on the part of business.

"It leaves the best people in industry at the mercy of the worst," comments Mr. Stern. "The decent people who would respond can't afford to. It's no more sensible to ask for it in consumerism than in school desegregation."

And if one ever needs a little graphic evidence that some city policing is needed, he should step out for a day with Basil Capers and Hyman Hendler, two of the department's 160 inspectors.

A special team assigned to follow up on specific complaints of shortweighting and other grocery volations, the two set off one recent Friday for Staten Island wearing trenchcoats and carrying black satchels (containing weights and violation and certificate of inspection forms).

SUMMONS ISSUED

At the first stop on Victory Boulevard, the market manager was issued a summons on several counts. He had goods in front of the scales so shoppers could not see the tally, few prices were posted on any items (New York law insists that prices be visible), and fresh meats were in the freezer with prices only for the asking.

At the second stop Mr. Hendler checked the weight on five packages of chicken cutlets and found 11 cents difference between weight price and package price. Several more violations were issued by the end of the day.

"Often we're told 'a new girl came on yesterday' or asked, 'Don't you ever make mistakes?' " says Mr. Hendler. "If they made me a judge, it might be different. But we're just here to enforce the law. . . One of these days maybe everybody will become honest and we'll be out of a job."

Until that day, city consumer departments have their work cut out for them.

Mr. Stern, who would like to see a governmental unit in every city take in consumer complaints, argues: "The better the consumer protection agency, the better business will do in handling complaints themselves. The very existence of a department is a spur to businessmen."

Just what kind of a department is best is still an open question.

"I rather lean toward an agency not answerable in any department, which can kind of stand back and throw darts without getting defensive—sort of like the Federal Reserve Board with the money supply," says Marian Ego, president of the new Boston Consumer Council.

A few city departments are slightly in awe of their own strength. The two-year-old commission on consumer protection in Columbus, Ohio, for instance, is authorized among other things to investigate consumer complaints and to help enforce the new city ordinance (the state has nothing comparable that allows a three-day "cooling off" period to cancel a sale solicited in a person's home. The law, passed in September, already has been well used.

C. R. Mercurio, superintendent of weights and measures in Columbus, is critical of the local Better Business Bureau for opposing several proposed city ordinances that would strengthen the commission: "It's perfectly logical for business to want to protect itself, but the BBB is trying to wear two hats. It can't expect to be paid by business and still serve the consumer."

HASTY PURCHASE CANCELED

The Ohioan, who keeps a full display of phony cents-off offers on his bookcase, considers the handling of consumer complaints perhaps the most important function of his office.

Among those he has helped is Mrs. Donald Van Culim, who took advantage of a postcard offer of a free camera with "no gimmicks." When she called to ask for the camera, she was asked if her family likes music. One thing led to another, and after a home demonstration of a stereo tape recorder the Van Culims signed a contract for more than $800 worth of equipment. Although this was before the "cooling off" law, the family was able to cancel the contract through the city commission's help.

Chicago's Department of Consumer Sales, Weights, and Measures was established in 1966, well before that of New York City, but it does not have the same breadth of regulatory or licensing power.

Blond, miniskirted Mrs. Jane Bryne, who has been commissioner of the department for the past 1½ years, admits she would like more licensing powers. Not long ago work of her department netted 121 convictions of gas-station owners (a licensed business) who among other things did not post the same price for gas at the curb and on the pump. The commissioner points out that home maintenance workers and auto and appliance repairmen are not licensed.

"We have little regulatory power over anyone not licensed," she explains. "With licensing we have a bigger stick with which to protect the consumer."

Some watching the development of consumer-protection law are concerned about the constitutionality and the wisdom of having cities step heavily into this field on their own.

Should neighboring towns have different laws, such "balkanization" could be dangerous, they say. Also, if a practice is bad enough to warrant a law, why not one at the state level?

The problem, as some of the consumer guardians see it, is that the states don't always see the need. If city councils do, they say, why not take advantage of it?

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—XI: GIFT HORSES THAT BITE

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—Deceptive sales gimmicks entice Americans to pay more than $1 billion a year—often for shoddy merchandise. Consumer officials warn: "If you hear you're going to get something for nothing, it's the time of your life to be careful.")

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.—The ad for a side of beef—U.S. choice at 69 cents a pound—looked intriguing enough to the Elmer Dewings of Sacramento. But when it came right down to samples, the 89-cents-a-pound variety was obviously (as the seller emphatically pointed out) far superior.

The Dewings promptly ordered a 280-pound side at the higher price. When the beef arrived at their home, they double-checked the weight and found 100 pounds was missing. Assured by neighborhood butchers that waste should account for no more than 40 pounds, the Dewings called the seller and politely suggested that the remainder might still be in his freezer.

When they recovered from the belligerent outburst at the other end of the line, they had nothing more to show for their efforts than the original inflated bill for goods never fully delivered.

In Dallas, Mrs. B. S. Calvin was similarly intrigued but slightly skeptical when a teacher colleague offered her a deluxe $40 blender free. All she had to do was give away one blender a month for the next seven months and persuade the recipients to agree to the same conditions. In the unlikely event that she could not find agreeable friends within the time limit, she would pay $10 per remaining blender to the company.

Reluctantly, she accepted the "gift." In the end, she managed to give away only two and wrote a $50 check to the company, more than covering the cost of the $40 blender. Her two friends, who could find no recipient, ended up paying a full $70 each.

THOUSANDS TRY GIMMICKS

Such deceptive sales gimmicks are tried by the thousands every day. All are carefully designed to get the consumer to part with more money than he originally intended or than the goods are worth. Only an estimated 10 percent of white-collar fraud is reported. But even at that the loss in cash and goods runs more than a billion dollars a year.

"Most of us wouldn't gyp anybody, and it doesn't occur to us that somebody might do it to us," comments Miss Kay MacDonald, investigator in the consumer protection-antitrust division of the Washington state attorney general's office. She cautions: "If you ever hear you're going to get something for nothing, it's the time of your life to be careful."

Gimmicks are not necessarily new. Just last year a newly widowed Seattle woman was talked into $17,000 worth of dance lessons. A Maryland man, approached by a door-to-door salesman who said he was taking a survey, found in five minutes he had ordered $100 worth of magazine subscriptions. An elderly Pittsburgh couple signed on the dotted line for a $1,395 aluminum-siding job—the assessed value of their home was a mere $650 in comparison. And just last year Missouri clamped down on furnace companies at work in the Kansas City area that were using scare tactics to persuade homeowners that the time was ripe for furnace replacements.

OLD METHODS STILL WORK

Some firms are busy thinking up imaginative new ways to gyp people. But many are content to stick with the old, proven methods because they still work. Also the legal system, particularly at the federal level, moves in at a slow gait to crack down on consumer fraud.

It took the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) 30 years to work up to a $100,000 fine in the Holland furnace case. With 500 offices around the country, the firm had used scare tactics—its agents misrepresenting themselves as safety engineers—to sell people unneeded furnaces.

When the heat is really on, a business in trouble sometimes packs up and tries the same game (often successfully) in another state.

"The big-scale fraud operators know that to keep moving and changing corporate structures is the way to do it," says Kit Bond, a lawyer in the Missouri attorney general's office.

Some think they are more apt to escape detection by arranging contracts for delivery of goods and services in another state.

Donald Navoni, a Seattle lawyer and former assistant attorney general in that state, tells of a scheme used by a firm at the Seattle World's Fair by which anybody interested "won" a quarter-acre tract of land near water in New Mexico. All recipients had to pay were certain "closing costs" (worth more than the price of the land).

The water turned out to be 900 feet underground, and the "fertile, gently rolling hills" were described in the ensuing state attorney general's suit as "hills of granite which rise conspicuously above the lava-capped plateau."

As the relatively new field of consumer-protection law develops at the state level, some of the more blatantly deceptive and unfair practices are being singled out by legislators and judges as illegal.

Massachusetts, for instance, enjoys a rating of "consumers' paradise" from many who count its protective legislation the strongest in the country. Specifically, it legalizes the keeping of unsolicited gifts; provides a three-day "cooling-off" period in which a buyer may cancel any retail-sales agreement made in his home; and abolishes the "holder in due course" contract clause which minimizes any finance company's liability to the buyer.

"TIGHT LITTLE BATTLES"

Structurally, Massachusetts is well supplied with a Consumers Council at the executive level, a consumer division in the attorney general's office, a new city-government unit in Boston, and a voluntary state consumer association. Also, as a pioneer legislator in this field, Massachusetts has good reason to think twice about laws it enacts.

Both its truth-in-lending and credit-bureau laws have served as models for federal legislation. Neither, however, passed without a fight.

"We've had some tight little battles," recalls Dermot Shea, executive director of the Consumers Council. He says most of the laws have served as "deterrents."

The fight has been no less elsewhere.

"Business fought our 'cooling-off' provision tooth and nail," says Edwin Palumbo, executive director of the Rhode Island Consumers Council. "We were upsetting a relationship they thought had been fair for years."

Business finds it especially hard to tolerate state laws which are tougher than their federal counterparts. Armour & Co., Wilson & Co., Inc., and Geo. A. Hormel & Co., for instance, are suing the Michigan Department of Agriculture to try to keep it from enforcing its relatively stringent standards on the content of processed meat.

Currently 28 states have a law similar to the Federal Trade Commission Act. Five—Hawaii, Vermont, Washington, Massachusetts, and North Carolina—exactly duplicate the language, prohibiting "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in business."

Much of the impetus behind state consumer-protection laws has come in the last few years with the increased threat of federal legislation. Minnesota, for instance, passed 21 consumer laws just last year.

Although consumerism remains a fairly bipartisan issue, politics has its role. In 1967 in California, for instance, Gov. Ronald Reagan appointed Mrs. Kay Valory, one of his county campaign managers, to the long-established post of consumer counsel. Promptly whittling the budget and the staff, she put the thrust of her efforts into consumer education and has conceded: "Perhaps I could accomplish more working for industry."

"It's become a political controversy as to whether the consumer counsel is protecting the consumer or not," allows Donald Livingston, head of California's Division of Consumer Affairs.

"Our concept of the office is dramatically different from our predecessors, and we don't walk away from that. They made a blanket indictment of all industry. We're not business apologist, but we start on the premise that the vast majority of businessmen are honest, and we're not just going out to harass them with overregulation."

Much of the enforcement work in state consumer legislation falls on state attorneys general. With New York leading the way in 1957, some 30 states now have separate consumer-protection divisions within that office. They commonly have at their disposal (though for limited use) the injunction weapon which the FTC now is trying to obtain.

PINPOINTING SPECIFICS

Most feel the broader their state statute of consumer-fraud authority, the better. The courts, they say, are perfectly capable of pinpointing the specifics. In New York, for instance, courts often have liberally interpreted a provision in the Uniform Commercial Code (law, in most states) which restrains a creditor from making "unconscionable" agreements. In a case last year involving a welfare recipient who, with credit and insurance charges, was paying $1,235 for a home-freezer unit actually worth about $300, a New York court ruled that, fraud or not, the pricing itself was "unconscionable" and grounds for cancellation of the contract.

"The unconscionability doctrine is the most important weapon the consumer has today in the fight against white-collar fraud," says Stephen Mindell, New York assistant attorney general. "By it, courts can effectively cut through technicalities and combat the whole theory of 'let the buyer beware.' "

Flexibility is seen as key. "If you're solving modern problems, you have to be as sophisticated as the people committing the fraud," says Herschel Elkins, California's deputy attorney general. "You can't be hamstrung by antiquated methods."

Most attorneys general have found it good politics, though time consuming, to accept consumer complaints. Many have file drawers full and find them useful for building patterns of evidence on various cases if they can keep from getting bogged down in the process.

CUSTOMERS DISGRUNTLED

"A lot who write in are just disgruntled customers," admits Douglas Head, Minnesota Attorney General. "We're kind of caught because we want complaints, but we can't act as individual lawyers for people."

"Sometimes people think all they have to do is complain to the attorney general's office," adds Wayne Hoecker, assistant attorney general in Missouri's Kansas City office. "I had a lady the other day who wanted me to get her out of a health-club contract because the club had 'embarrassed' her."

A minute fraction of complaints actually end up in court cases, and that's the way state law-enforcement officials like it. They view mediation as one of their most important tasks.

The states are increasingly active in consumer-education work. Talk shows, educational pamphlets (often in Spanish and English), and school-assembly programs are common. In accord with a legislative mandate, the Rhode Island Consumers' Council is helping people meet out their income to pay the bills through credit counseling.

The Kentucky Consumer Affairs Commission was set up by the governor of that state in 1968 for the prime purpose of stimulating consumer education. Conveniently, Mrs. Oscar Sowards, whom the governor tapped as chairman, heads the 14,000-member Kentucky Federation of Women's Clubs, and she has put the women immediately to work developing teaching units on credit and food buying which they now are teaching in all parts of the state.

EDUCATION QUESTIONED

Those in the law-enforcement field who see the problems firsthand generally are not optimistic about education as a solution to consumer problems. Many would agree with Gale P. Gotschall, the FTC's assistant general counsel for federal-state cooperation, who told a Kansas City, Mo., audience last year that it is far easier to try to reach a few thousand businessmen and dissuade them from unfair, deceptive practices than try to educate 200 million consumers in the "myriad ways in which they might get cheated."

Auto repairing is a field where there is much abuse of the consumer. Some auto repair shops frankly admit they would be selling out to their competition if they advertised the actual price they will charge for work. Such firms invariably lure the motorist with a low posted price—then tack on "unforeseen charges."

Reaching such businessmen, however, is not an easy task, even after the deceit is committed. The offices of most attorneys general are understaffed and underbudgeted. If they can afford to handle consumer cases at all, they must concentrate on the very worst offenders and hope that the ripple effect of publicity will work on the rest.

Also the line between hard sell and fraud is hard to distinguish. Many of the most questionable sales and collection practices are still perfectly legal.

CONTRACT RULED INVALID

"Our legal machine is on the side of the exploiter," insists Howard Frazier, president of the Consumer Federation of America.

Many consider the Office of Economic Opportunity's legal-services program one of the best things that ever happened to the consumer movement. These poverty lawyers have been instrumental in fighting the uniform consumer-credit code. They have also taken on a number of borderline-gray consumer cases for the poor and have fared well.

Last year in Detroit, for instance, a judge ruled a contract invalid which involved an elderly lady and an upholstery job with the Famous Furniture Company. She thought she was signing the contract to get the job done, but when a dispute arose later, company officials maintained she had temporarily sold them her furniture while they did the job (according to a small-print clause on the back of the contract) and that they had the right to repossess it. She had neither seen nor been told about the clause.

"You can usually defend a consumer case and win," says V. Paul Donnelly, the consumer lawyer on the case and consumer-fraud coordinator for Wayne County neighborhood legal services. "Business has gotten by for so long without a challenge that it tends to be careless in drawing up its contracts."

Although technically prevented from lobbying, some of these poverty lawyers think the day is not far off when they will be able to do so.

"If there's one thing we're learning fast," says John H. Schlegel, attorney in Chicago's Legal Aid Bureau, "it's that legislation is lobbying."

For middle-income consumers, the right to a day in court at this point is less well established than it is for the poor. Until recently private lawyers have not bothered to steep themselves in consumer law because the profit involved in most cases is so slim.

Although lawyerless small-claim courts are slowly raising claim ceilings (some like Washington State are as low as $50) and are working toward more evening and Saturday hours (New York City has succeeded well), they are often used far more by business than by the consumer. Garnishments and default judgments are common.

It may be noted, however, that one Oregon professor, in tune with the "pollution" times and aware of his court rights, recently used the small-claims court in Eugene to sue a firm with a smokestack for $20 in paint damages to his house. He was not overly surprised that he lost the case.

Occasionally justice in such courts, in the words of one critic, "depends on whether the judge's wife burned the toast." Judge John Patrick O'Brien of Detroit's Common Pleas Court counters that the job is "tough on a judge because you get so much heresay evidence." He says the largest number of cases he is called upon to settle involve cleaners, and often no sales slip can be produced.

"There has to be some bit of evidence to make you believe one party rather than another," says Judge O'Brien.

Phillip G. Schrag, a lawyer for the National Assocation for the Advancement of Colored People's legal defense and educational funds, has conducted extensive test litigation in the consumer field. He describes the general court atmosphere toward consumer cases as less "hostile" than "indifferent."

GROUP ACTION URGED

Certainly the current proposal to allow group-consumer action (class action) in federal courts is seen as a valuable addition to consumer options. Through it, collection-dollar restitution would be possible, and more private lawyers would then be induced to take on consumer cases.

In the days ahead, consumers may also look toward increased state and federal protective legislation. So far, the development has been more hodgepodge than orderly.

"You have a few progressive states and many more that do nothing," notes Robert L. Meade, director for legislative affairs in the President's Committee on Consumer Interests and formerly a drafter of much of the successful Massachusetts legislation. "If all were the same there's no need for federal legislation."

To some, the dividing line between needed state and federal activity in the consumer field appears crystal clear.

"With individual grievances, it's logical that action should be at the state level," comments Miss Diane McKaig, executive director of the Michigan Consumers Council and formerly special assistant for consumer affairs at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. "But there's a large area for federal action. Take product safety. What are we going to do—stand on the state line and reject every lawn mower that isn't safe?"

Given the mobility of business and the variation in state law, some, like California's Mr. Elkins, are pressing for expanded federal concern. The deputy attorney general points to a case in which individuals in New York signed contracts for delivery of cars in California and, only at the pickup scene, found them to be rundown taxicabs.

"The federal government has to get into this sort of thing," he says. "No one else has jurisdiction. . . . Many such out-of-state frauds we shouldn't have to get into."

So far, the FTC has resisted efforts of the administration and others to expand its province of concern from practices "in" interstate commerce to those "affecting" such commerce. FTC officials, argue that their tight budget would keep them from doing a good job. They urge the states to adopt legislation similar to the FTC act, and they encourage Congress to subsidize state enforcement efforts.

In any case, many state officials think the FTC should be taking a much stronger lead in coordinating the activities of the many states and serving as an informational clearinghouse. The commission has had a special office of federal-state cooperation since 1965, but it is virtually a one-man office. Also, although regional FTC manpower often exceeds an attorney general's staff in a city by 5 to 1, the federal employees need permission from Washington to take even the slightest action of investigation.

THE CONSUMER FIGHTS BACK—XII: CONSUMERS WANT A LOUD, PERMANENT VOICE

(By Lucia Mouat)

(NOTE.—A flurry of bills in Washington all seek to aid the consumer. The federal government already does much for buyers. But consumer advocates want to focus and tighten these efforts and open new ones.)

WASHINGTON.—In Washington this year, consumer efforts focus on building a loud and permanent voice in the name of the public interest. For the moment, spotty protective legislation is definitely second in importance. What consumer advocates and Congress seem most eager to see is an organizational setup that would ensure firm consumer representation in government decisionmaking.

Just what form this voice would take—whether it should come from inside or outside the government and whether from one office or two—is being hotly debated. The only point on which virtually everyone now agrees is that it should not be a Cabinet-level department, an idea which has been kicking around Capitol Hill for a good decade. Some 39 agencies now shoulder the government's consumer protection burden, and it is considered a Herculean (and in many ways unwise) task to try to unite them.

President Nixon's "buyer's bill of rights" proposal would divide powers between a permanent "Office of Consumer Affairs" in the Executive Office and a new "Division of Consumer Protection" within the Department of Justice. The latter would advocate the consumer's position before regulatory agencies and enforce the administration's consumer protection act which pinpoints 11 areas of unfair and deceptive practices.

Rep. Florence P. O'Dwyer (R) of New Jersey, in a bill with widespread political support (66 Republican and Democratic cosponsors), would keep advocacy and enforcement functions within a permanent executive office of consumer affairs. That office on its own could conduct hearings, conferences, and surveys.

INDEPENDENT AGENCY WEIGHED

Still another proposal would establish a full-fledged independent agency—such as NASA for space affairs—as a central voice for consumers. Reasoning that the White House is the center of political pressure, Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D) of New York, chairman of the Democratic Study Group, consumer task force, and sponsor of the bill, wants an agency that can move with as much freedom as possible. Among many duties, it would intervene in the consumer's interest before regulatory agencies and conduct economic investigations and studies as it saw fit.

A fourth suggestion as to "who shall represent the consumer" comes from Sen. Philip A. Hart (D) of Michigan. He proposes an independent nongovernmental council with local units to receive complaints and arbitrate issues "too small for courts and too big to ignore." Supported by government and foundation funds, the council would serve as an ombudsman, dispense product information, and represent the consumer before governmental agancies. Senator Hart sees a number of "enlightened" business representatives on the council—a point which some consumer advocates criticize.

There is also strong interest in Washington in the government's role in product testing and information.

Thousands of products from raincoats to tires are tested for the General Services Administration, Department of Defense, Department of Agriculture, and the like, but few taxpayers ever know the results.

PRODUCT TESTING A POSSIBILITY

In addition to requiring release of all current government testing information, Mr. Rosenthal's bill, which has the noteworthy support of the Consumer Federation of America, Consumers Union, and consumer advocate Ralph Nader, would establish facilities to carry on more extensive product testing.

Mrs. O'Dwyer's bill would require release of current testing information and give the National Bureau of Standards increased authority to set up facilities to test any products voluntarily submitted. Industries would be free to advertise results. The administration's bill would put the emphasis on certifying methods used in private testing labs.

"We wouldn't put the government in the testing business," explains Mrs. Virginia Knauer, the President's special assistant for consumer affairs. "Standardizing of procedures is what we're after."

Mrs. Knauer is, quite naturally, a strong supporter of her employer's consumer policy: "I think President Nixon personally and the whole administration are sensitive to consumer problems," she commented in a recent interview. "The President's 'buyer's bill of rights' proves that without a doubt. It is the strongest message any president has produced."

However, the former director of Pennsylvania's Bureau of Consumer Protection did not hesitate to take issue—at a discrete distance—with Secretary of Commerce Maurice Stan's comment during a speech last fall that "the wave of consumerism [might] move too far and destroy the freedom of choice of consumers." She responded coolly but firmly to a question at a press conference later that "it won't get out of hand."

Mr. Nader, who credits her with some "very good speeches," describes her as in a "hostile environment" by virtue of the exbusinessmen in the administration to whom she must report.

Mrs. Knauer, who spent eight years as a member of the Philadelphia City Council and is familiar with the political realities of working in government, insists "we have to have the cooperation of business and regulate it with legislation where necessary." She counts it a victory that she got clearance from the White House to contact business directly on complaints received and sometimes writes company presidents to get the the action desired.

A LAWYER—FILING PAPERS

Reform of the nation's regulatory agencies is seen as crucial to some as a permanent voice for consumers. The bureaucracy, entangling red tape, and limited power of many of these agencies are well known to all. The Food and Drug Administration, for instance, has no authority to summon witnesses or require companies to divulge their records. In the Federal Trade Commission all five commissioners must be involved in the proceedings before a company can even be told there is a complaint against it, and cases normally drag on for years.

"Most of my cases were older than I am," says 26-year-old John Hayward, who recently resigned as one of FTC's attorneys. "More manpower isn't the problem. There's just not that much work to do. I spent all my time filing papers. A high-school graduate with a little knowledge of legal terms could have done it."

The administration's consumer proposals would help. In part, they seek the preliminary injunction weapon for the FTC which would add to its power. Also called for are a review of the Food and Drug Administration's internal procedures and a study of the safety of all food additives, regardless of how long they have been on the market.

Meanwhile, there are increased private efforts to establish consumer representation in such agencies. Concerned about a quiet "consent" settlement between the FTC and the Campbell Soup Company on a charge of false advertising, a group of George Washington University Law School students organized as Students Opposed to Unfair Practices (soup). They are working to establish a public right to intervene in all FTC hearings and agreements.

Similarly law students in the new Center for Law and Social Research in Washington (supported by charitable grants) are aiming to establish the same right on a broader scale.

Some consumer advocates think the day is coming when such public spokesmanship will extend directly to the marketplace.

"Today a Ford is a Plymouth is a Chevrolet," comments George Brunn, municipal court judge in Berkeley, Calif., and a member of the board of the Association of California Consumers. "All sell for roughly the same price, are equally unsafe, and expensive to maintain. A reasonable society doesn't have to put up with this. I'd like to see consumers have a direct voice in how cars are designed and manufactured and sold."

Most businessmen counter that competition is alive and well and that consumers do vote with their dollars for what they like. These are also skeptical of the government's increasingly "paternal" role in consumerism and wonder aloud how many consumers really want what's being pushed their way.

"The trouble with consumers is they're trying to put business out of business," snaps one. "It's either going to get the price out of sight or break down the whole distribution system."

Although business and the consumer are essentially tugging for the most in the same dollar, some observers think there are points of unity which both sides are missing. Some businesses could patch their image effectively in the eyes of some buyers by at least appearing to cater to consumerism rather than defiantly turning their backs. Similarly, some businessmen feel consumers are not doing their fair share in the effort to separate the good from the bad. Until the distinctions begin, they say, consumer mistrust of business will result in a united front.

It is fairly certain that consumers are not likely to be a well-organized group anytime in the immediate future. They will continue to lean on labor and other allied support, knowing full well there are points at which the interests diverge. But the interest is growing—with the inclusion of pollution, students are swelling the ranks—and if they stick with the facts, the cause of consumerism may very well make up for what they now lack in numbers and organization.

Some, like Judge Brunn, consider the movement at a critical juncture.

"The average citizen is getting more and more frustrated about the impact he has . . . The great thing about someone like Ralph Nader or Rachel Carson is that it suddenly gives people the feeling that one person can make a difference . . . If consumerism doesn't catch on and give people that feeling, they're likely to turn away or engage in unorganized or hostile behavior. We've seen it in race relations where hopes and expectations rose faster than any political system could deliver."

A GOOD CANDIDATE

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, recently, an editorial appeared in the Chicago Polish Daily News, the oldest and one of the largest American-Polish dailies published in Chicago, concerning the need to select an excellent candidate, namely, Lawrence F. O'Brien, to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

This editorial appeared on February 16, almost 3 weeks before Larry O'Brien was chosen for his present position. It placed into proper perspective the need for the Democratic Party to have someone of Larry O'Brien's stature to reunite the party and resolve the difficult problems facing it.

I agree with the editorial that with Larry O'Brien at the helm, the Democratic Party will again be victorious at all levels of government.

Mr. Speaker, the editorial follows:

A GOOD CANDIDATE

The former co-worker of President Kennedy and President Johnson, Lawrence F. O'Brien, who is considered to be an outstanding political leader, is being considered for Chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee.

He is an excellent candidate.

In the past, he has proven to be a great tactician as well as organizer and an outstanding political and Party leader. He has also shown impressive abilities as Chairman of the Democratic Party during the difficult period of Vice President Humphrey's race for the Presidency.

Mr. O'Brien has the kind of qualifications which are needed by the Democrats, from the Party point of view, because they need a person who is thoroughly familiar with the national political machinery; who is practical in his approach, and who can unite all the factions which form the Democratic Party.

The Party faces difficult times financially, is disunited, suffering from defeat; all these factors must be overcome to face the congressional elections this year and in two years another Presidential election.

If the Party is to rebuild itself after being weakened by the loss of the White House; if it wishes to recapture many of the gubernatorial seats it lost, and if it wants to retain its leadership in both Houses, it needs a man like Larry O'Brien, who is a truly great organizer and Party leader to head the National Committee.

It must be admitted that former President Johnson weakened the National Committee and lessened its role in the political life of our country. Since he insisted that he is the leading Democratic political leader, he permitted the National Democratic Committee to run down and limited its role among all factions of our country, including the nationalities groups, and thus made it very difficult for a candidate like Humphrey to win.

Thus, the Democrats again must become united, work together in setting up a strong, effective political organization from the Democratic National Committee down to the precinct level, and they again can expect victories in the races for the State Houses and Congress. They should assume firm leadership, strong position on issues and they can win even againt the functioning Republican "machine."

TRIBUTE TO DR. THEODORE BRAUN

HON. VANCE HARTKE

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, tucked away in obscure corners of the world are some really "beautiful people." Only occasionally do their names come to our attention, and then we learn of an Ida Scudder of Vellore or an Albert Schweitzer of Lambarene. For the most part, they quietly love God with their lives and touch fellow men with healing.

One such model of love and healing is Dr. Theodore Braun, a Lutheran pastor's son from Wyerts, Nebr., whose career is briefly sketched in an essay by Wilson C. Egbert. I ask unanimous consent that the essay be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALL IN THE DOCTOR'S BAG

(By Wilson C. Egbert)

The Mandated Territory of New Guinea is a little more than twice the size of Louisiana and a little less than the size of Wyoming. Its tropical swamps along the seacoast will match the tidewater swamps of Louisiana and its mountains range to the heights of Wyoming.

In 1930 a medical graduate of the University of Chicago increased the number of doctors by 14% when Dr. Theodore Braun came to serve a mission hospital at Amele, eight miles inland from Madang, New Guinea. He was the eighth doctor in this sector of the world's second largest island. For three years he divided his time between the ALC hospital at Amele and the Finschhafen hospital of the German missions.

Malaria and yaws, battle injuries from arrow and stone axe, leprosy and tuberculosis were all in this medic's bag of work. And in some of those years Dr. Braun would top a thousand operations. When he came to the island, a lifetime of isolation was the lot of lepers, and natives thought it strange that the government would only punish murder with a six-year sentence while the leper got "life." Now new drugs and treatment patterns have taken the terror out of "Hansen's disease" and have as well controlled malaria and tuberculosis.

There was a nurse at Amele hospital who couldn't "see" the new doctor for sour apples. Her name was Hattie Engeling and she had already served in New Guinea for five years. "He seemed arrogant to me," she said. But Hattie Engeling became Mrs. Theodore Braun. She stayed with him as his operating room nurse, was imprisoned with him during the Japanese invasion in World War II, lived through the deadly strafing of the prison ship on which they were being moved to an ugly internment camp at Hollandia, and came back after the war's end for a four-year stint at Finschhafen while mission builders were building the Yagaum hospital near Madang.

Last summer Dr. Braun resigned as chief of staff at Yagaum, the 395-bed hospital he helped to bring into being. The leave-taking of this senior doctor in the territory was a gala affair. He was honored by churches and government, by nationals he had served and nurses he had trained. Lutheran and Catholic missionaries, legislators, and national pastors said, "Thanks—and be sure to come back."

On New Year's Day, Queen Elizabeth II announced the Empire's honors. To Dr. Theodore Braun, a pastor's son from Wyerts, Neb., came the "Order of the British Empire," Australia's prime minister, John Gorton, sent a telegram, "well-merited honor."

Dr. Braun has seen many changes in what was once a Stone Age culture. Now there are 160 doctors to serve the nearly three million people. He took part in the early training programs of national medical aides. "Our nurse's training program was the first (1950) coeducational institution in New Guinea," he said. In the years before World War II, the training of nurses was made difficult by tribal languages, and by the need for basic education in reading and numbers. But Dr. Braun is quick to point out that "these people are as intelligent as we are—they simply had chosen a different mode of life."

He said that while the tribal groups had no overall government, they had a lot of law rooted in their own culture. Two tribes, for example, fought a battle regularly once a year—trading battle sites from one to the other and never attacking the invader until they were rested from their journey. Dr. Braun became a "military surgeon" inadvertently in one of these tribal wars. Tribes in the central highlands, where the territory was just being opened to mission work, heard that there was a doctor on the ridge above the battlefield. He was soon treating casualties from both sides, and weapons were checked outside.

Over the years, Dr. Braun observed, "the medical work we had did have a good effect not only on the New Guinea tribes but also on the Chinese and white population." The national church would testify to that—it wants to keep medical work going as a church contribution to what may some day be a new nation.

In July, Dr. Theodore Braun, O.B.E., and Mrs. Braun will be heading home to New Guinea. Awaiting them will be Teddy, their New Guinean adopted son, now a pre-law student in Australia. And on a lot given them by a grateful national, they'll build a home.

Some years ago a missionary friend told me of his chance meeting with an Australian newsman who said, "You chaps have a Schweitzer up there in New Guinea—only nobody seems to know about it." It looks as though he were right.

FEDERAL BUDGET REDUCTION

HON. FRANK T. BOW

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, the American Farm Bureau has just released its annual review of the Federal budget with suggestions for reductions that would assure a sizable surplus in the next fiscal year. This is always a helpful analysis and, without endorsing any specifics of the document, I wish to insert it in the RECORD for the consideration of the Members, as follows:

FARM BUREAU'S RECOMMENDED REDUCTIONS IN THE FEDERAL BUDGET, FISCAL 1971

The Budget for 1971 has again created some confusion in that it projects a surplus for the year, yet the debt will rise. This comes about as a result of the new unified budget first adopted two years ago.

For the stated purpose of showing the full impact of the Budget on the economy the receipts and expenditures of the several trust funds are included in budget totals. During 1971 it is estimated that trust fund receipts will exceed trust fund expenditures by $8.6 billion. However, federal fund receipts will fall $7.3 billion short of federal fund expenditures. The difference between the $8.6 billion trust fund surplus and the $7.3 billion federal fund deficit is $1.3 billion—the announced budget surplus for 1971. Since the trust fund surplus cannot be used to cover federal fund expenditures, it will be necessary to borrow funds to cover the federal fund deficit if the Budget is adopted as presented.

Also, there is no certainty that receipts will be as high as estimated. The Budget estimate on receipts assumes that Congress will adopt new, and extend expiring taxes in the amount of $1.6 billion, adopt a $1.2 billion postal rate increase, and be able to sell some $1.3 billion of Farmers Home Administration loans in the open market.

In the area of federal spending, Farm Bureau policy for 1970 states in part as follows:

"Inflation is a serious threat to economic stability. Excessive federal government spending is the basic cause of our current problem of inflation. Deficit spending by the federal government and policies which expand the supply of money and credit faster than production clearly lead to inflation. Both Congress and the Executive Branch of government must face up to this fact and bring expenditures into balance wtih income at tax rates which are not oppressive."

The following pages include recommendations for reductions in New Spending Authority of nearly $12 billion. These reductions could bring about expenditure savings of nearly $6.5 billion during fiscal 1971. If these recommendations are followed by the Congress and the Executive the prospects for a cash deficit would be nearly eliminated.

RECOMMENDED BUDGET REDUCTIONS, FISCAL 1971

[In millions]

		Expenditures	New spending authority
051	ABM research	$49	$132
	Military housing		116
057	Military assistance	600	454
058	Atomic weapons		143
151	U.N. Building		20
152	Foreign aid	44	1,116
	Pan-Am Highway	4	20
401	Corps of Army Engineers	133	110
	Waste treatment		3,400
405	Land acquisition	68	182
501	Supersonic transport, airports	439	583
502	Shipbuilding	30	90
506	Secretary of Transportation	12	20
507	Appalachian development	25	13
551	OEO	710	869
	Model cities	230	230
554	Planning and research		43
555	Low-rent housing	189	180
601	Elementary and secondary education		288
602	Higher education	101	5
604	New manpower training	714	677
701	Social security		204
702	Food stamps	425	400
908	Law enforcement	191	212
	Revenue sharing	275	275
	Other pay increases	1,400	1,400
	Contingency funds	800	800
	Total reductions	6,439	11,982

An explanation of each of the reductions proposed in the summary table follows:

NATIONAL DEFENSE

051—Increase of $132 million of NSA and $49 million of expenditures for ABM research should be absorbed through reductions in other areas.

051—Increase of $116 million of NSA for additional family housing should be denied.

057—Since military assistance is difficult to distinguish from regular defense operations, Farm Bureau again recommends NSA of $454 million and expenditures of $600 million be transferred to and absorbed within regular defense appropriations without increases due to the transfer.

058—Increase of $143 million of NSA for additional atomic weapons should be denied.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS AND FINANCE

151—Proposal to donate $20 million to U.N. for new headquarters should be denied saving NSA of that amount.

152—In line with spending levels suggested over the years for foreign aid NSA of $541 million can be saved in development loans, economic assistance and Alliance for Progress. Another $575 million of NSA and $44 million of expenditures should be denied for new international banking ventures.

152—Proposal to build 250 miles of road in Panama and Columbia as a part of Pan-Am Highway should at least be delayed saving NSA of $20 million and expenditures of $4 million.

SPACE RESEARCH AND TECHNOLOGY

Sharp budget cuts have already been made in NASA. Without more information than is generally available, it would be difficult to suggest further cuts.

AGRICULTURE AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Major expenditures under Functional Code 350, Agriculture and Rural Development, are made by the Commodity Credit Corporation. Since these expenditures are mandatory by law, there is no opportunity to reduce them through the appropriation process. Farm Bureau is supporting major changes in basic farm law which, if adopted, would greatly reduce Commodity Credit Corporation expenditures over the next five years by substituting less expensive land retirement and commodity loan programs for the annual diversion and income support payments now being made to producers of cotton, wheat and feed grains.

NATURAL RESOURCES

401—Corps of Army Engineering construction should be held to last year's level saving NSA of $110 million and expenditures of $133 million.

401—It is proposed that $4 billion be appropriated for waste treatment to be used over the next 5 years. This should be handled annually. By using previously unspent funds during 1971, an appropriation of $400 million will be more than adequate to meet needs saving NSA of $3,400 million.

405—Land acquisition should be held to last year's level saving NSA of $182 million and expenditures of $68 million.

COMMERCE AND TRANSPORTATION

501—NSA of $290 million and expenditures of $275 million for the super-sonic transport should be denied. Also, new airport development programs should be denied saving NSA of $293 million and expenditures of $164 million.

502—Maritime ship building should be held to general level of recent years saving NSA of $90 million and expenditures of $30 million.

506—Office of the Secretary nearly doubles in one year. Holding to 1970 levels would save NSA of $20 million and expenditures of $12 million.

507—Appalachian development program held to last years level would save NSA of $13 billion and expenditures of $25 billion.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT AND HOUSING

551—The OEO Should be abolished, with essential programs being transferred to other agencies of government saving NSA of $869 million and expenditures of $710 million.

551—Model Cities program outlays should be held to 1970 level saving NSA of $230 million and expenditures of $230 million.

554—Requests for comprehensive planning and for urban research should be kept in line with spending plans saving NSA of $43 million.

555—Low-rent housing contributions should be held to last year's levels saving NSA of $180 million and expenditures of $189 million.

EDUCATION AND MANPOWER

601—Increase for elementary and secondary education should be denied saving NSA of $288 million.

602—Programs for higher education should be held to last year's level saving NSA of $5 million and expenditures of $101 million.

604—New Manpower Training Act calls for $677 million of NSA and expenditures of $714 million. This should be denied and if additions are needed should be provided under the Manpower Training and Development Act.

INCOME SECURITY

701—Farm Bureau opposes proposed increase in Social Security wage base saving NSA of $204 million.

702—It is proposed that the number of food stamps recipients be increased by about 40 percent, but costs more than double. Holding the costs to a level consistent with recipient increase would save NSA of $400 million and expenditures of $425 million.

GENERAL GOVERNMENT

908—Increased aid to states for law enforcement should be denied saving NSA of $212 million and expenditures of $191 million.

OTHER

Revenue sharing should be denied saving NSA of $275 million and expenditures of $275 million.

Recent government pay raises have placed government employees out of line with private sectors. Pay increases should be withheld saving NSA of $1,400 million and expenditures of $1,400.

A contingency of $100 million is adequate saving NSA of $800 million and expenditures of $800 million.

THE ABM ISSUE

HON. PAUL J. FANNIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, shortly the Senate will again be asked to consider the issue of expanding the ABM program in light of the defense needs of the Nation and the best judgment of administration officials.

A cogent editorial published recently in the Cleveland Plain Dealer has, I think, a sufficient bearing on the issue to be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial writer notes:

Deescalating the arms race and reducing military expenditures is much easier said than done. That sad truth must be contemplated by Americans in their consideration of (Secretary) Laird's warning.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Feb. 24, 1970]

NO ARMS LETUP

While there might be the temptation to dismiss it as only a pitch for expansion of the Safeguard antiballistic missile system, Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird's warning about Russia's continuing missile buildup should be taken seriously.

Laird reported to a joint session of the Senate Armed Services and Appropriations committees that the Russian buildup could place this country "in a second-rate strategic position" by 1975.

Much as the United States might want to reduce military expenditures by cutting back on costly arms programs, it cannot, in the face of such a warning, do so. In these turbulent world times, it cannot risk vulnerability. It has little choice but to maintain costly arms programs in the face of a threat such as that posed by the Russian buildup.

About the only recognized hope for slowing or stopping the arms race depends upon the outcome of strategic arms limitation talks which will be resumed with Russia in April. That situation is ironical, however, because if the United States and the Soviet Union are to negotiate from positions of strength, they must in the meantime continue doing the very things they intend to talk about not doing.

De-escalating the arms race and reducing military expenditures is much easier said than done. That sad truth must be contemplated by Americans in their consideration of Laird's warning.

QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

HON. JOEL T. BROYHILL

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I mailed questionnaires to 115,000 families, representing approximately 210,000 registered voters in the 10th Congressional District of Virginia, asking their opinion on some of the many urgent issues before the Congress.

Some 42,000 of my constituents have now responded to this questionnaire, and I shall make their responses a part of the RECORD.

I believe the opinions expressed by voters of northern Virginia are particularly significant, because they have for many years proven a very accurate reflection of national opinion, as is demonstrated by the fact that northern Virginia voters have, since 1956, voted closely in proportion with the nationwide vote in each presidential election; that is, in 1956 former President Eisenhower received 56.4 percent of the 10th District vote, and 57.7 percent of the national vote; candidate Nixon received 51.1 percent of the 10th District vote in 1960 as opposed to 49.9 percent nationally; candidate GOLDWATER received 37.8 percent of the 10th District vote in 1964, while receiving 38.4 percent of the national vote, and President Nixon received 46.6 percent of the 10th District vote as opposed to 43.6 percent of the national vote.

The overall results, as of March 25, are as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to offer the views of 42,000 individuals who live in a congressional district with one of the highest educational levels in the United States. These citizens, both men and women, have perhaps greater knowledge and greater interest concerning Federal Government affairs than any other such group in the Nation. Their high interest is demonstrated by the huge percentage that responded.

The results of this questionnaire are worth careful consideration by anyone who is concerned with our Nation, because these people have shown continually that their views are in almost exact keeping with the national consensus.

In concluding, let me say that I am indeed proud that I have the honor to be chosen as the representative for constituents of such intelligence and perception with such interest in the problems with which our Nation is confronted.

OPPORTUNITIES INDUSTRIALIZATION CENTERS

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower, and Poverty recently held a hearing on the Opportunities Industrialization Centers. The OIC's, primarily financed with private donations, are possibly the finest self-help, job-training programs in the Nation.

The session was attended by OIC representatives from across the Nation, as well as dozens of OIC trainees and graduates from Washington, Philadelphia, and other cities. Many more OIC supporters could not be accommodated in the hearing room to listen to testimony on the important work and accomplishments of this fine program.

To enable Senators and others across the Nation to gain a better understanding of the work of the Opportunities Industrialization Centers, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of the prepared testimony be printed in the Extensions of Remarks. Specifically, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the comments of the Reverend Dr. Leon H. Sullivan, the Philadelphia minister who is founder and chairman of the OIC's, and Representative SHIRLEY CHISHOLM, within whose Brooklyn, N.Y., district the OIC has established a very successful jobs program.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY GIVEN BEFORE U.S. SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT, MANPOWER AND POVERTY ON THE MANPOWER TRAINING ACT—MARCH 19, 1970

(By Rev. Leon H. Sullivan)

New and restructured efforts towards training the unemployed and the underemployed in America must be taken in the immediate future, or the entire country will be covered by a sea of welfarism and a gulf of hopelessness. It is generally known that scores of millions of our citizens are prepared to perform only the most menial kinds of jobs; and that whereas often jobs are plentiful and available, requiring some minimal technical skill, still the jobs go unfilled even though the manpower supply is great, because there are not enough people amply trained to fill the jobs. This is particularly true among America's minorities of color, and the White Southern and Appalachian poor.

By the year 2000, the American population will have grown to nearly 300 million. By that time, due to technological developments, one-half the jobs being performed today will not even exist. This means that if meaningful manpower and re-training efforts are not successfully instituted and developed on a broad nationwide scale, by the year 2000, tens of millions of the American population, White and Black, will have to be subsidized to some degree by some form of welfare or income assistance, even if they are willing and able to work.

Especially, there is a need for successful massive training and re-training programs in the concentrated communities and rural areas where minority citizens of color are so numerous. In these areas, in addition to skill training, there is need for attitudinal and self-motivational training to assist men and women to qualify on a realistic and sustaining basis for employment opportunity in "non dead-end jobs," and to also help them to become a greater beneficiary, overall, within the national economy. For the needs of the poor and the unemployed and the underemployed are not only job related, but involve the training of attitudes and basic remedial communication and computational skills.

It is encouraging that the United States Senate is taking a hard new look at Manpower Legislation to see that new goals should be set and new methods utilized to fill some of the realistic needs of the unemployed and underemployed of America. Up to now, as far as the Black community particularly is concerned, federal manpower programs have failed utterly in reaching the real manpower and basic training needs of the masses. The effect has been tantamount to "a camel passing through the eye of a needle." The benefits of traditional manpower programs in the Black, Brown and Red minority communities in particular, have been so ineffective as to be "insignificant!"

Mechanisms have to be provided that will run the gamut of manpower delivery service to the employment market. These mechanisms will have to include recruitment, prevocational and attitudinal training, technical and skill education, job development, referral, and essential follow-up, once a person is on the job. It is essential, also, that the participation of the community be taken into account. Because, unless the people in the communities are involved in the manpower delivery and training services, any government sponsored, or privately sponsored effort, is doomed to failure.

The vast majority of the population in the concentrated community has lost faith in traditional manpower programs and services and is looking for other forms of programs and projects designed to adequately meet their needs.

In this respect I can see value in the Manpower Training Acts S1362, S2838 and it's proposed Amendment 440, especially in those areas where major emphasis is placed on a program's ability, public or private, to provide comprehensive employment services and job opportunities for low income persons who are unemployed or underemployed. Such services hopefully, too, must include recruitment, counseling, remediation, vocational training, job development, job placement and other appropriate services; and be such a program in which residents of the area to be served shall fully participate in the creation of, the operation of, and the development of the center; and where the business community in the area to be served is considered in its services and operation.

One program that fits these needed and essential requirements, that was begun six years ago in Philadelphia, and that has since spread into communities large and small across the United States, across the Ocean to African nations and to Latin America, is the Opportunities Industrialization Center (OIC). This is a program which fits into the true American tradition of the people finding a solution to their own problems.

The Opportunities Industrialization Center Program was founded in an old abandoned jailhouse in the City of Philadelphia in 1964, to provide attitudinal development and skill training (for available jobs), and placement and follow-up assistance, for the unskilled and unemployed and underemployed in the concentrated communities and rural areas of America.

The OIC has been phenomenally successful and makes taxpayers out of tax consumers. The program has developed a national reputation, particularly among industrial leaders, for its success in the development of manpower to meet the needs of industry and business.

The Philadelphia OIC prototype, since its beginning in 1964 through 1969, has trained and placed on jobs 9,600 men and women with new useful skills, one-third of whom had been on relief rolls and 95 percent of whom were classified in poverty categories. In Philadelphia alone, there are some 5000 additional persons at this time on a waiting list.

Emulating the Philadelphia prototype, 51 operational and 39 partially operable and developing OICs were reported at the end of 1969, making a total of 90 OICs throughout the nation. Among these 90, Philadelphia, Washington, Brooklyn, New York, Boston, Oklahoma City and Seattle OICs have the characteristics of having the best recruitment, job placement, retention and performance records of any training programs in the country.

In spite of the lack of adequate resources, the OIC's generally in America, comprise the best training programs overall in the nation, with an average national cost of approximately $1000 per person. This amounts to less than one-third the cost per individual in other federally sponsored training programs.

Up to February of 1970, nearly 50,000 (49,116) trainees have been helped in OIC's across the country, with 28,000 having been placed into training related jobs; and with additional thousands having received job placements and help directly from the OIC Feeder Program, which provides self-help motivational assistance to all OIC trainees.

Since 1964, the Opportunities Industrialization Centers have displayed a marked capability to provide the kind of training necessary to reduce the incidence of unemployment, and place significant numbers of disadvantaged workers on the road to economic security. OIC's, also, by their very existence in cities, have inspired new hope among the deprived masses in these communities where people have found in OIC a "training program that really cares about their needs."

Although the large majority of OIC trainees are African Americans, the OIC serves all Americans regardless of race or color.

One of the most unique and significant characteristics of the OIC Program is that it relates to, and is totally involved with the community. OIC's are initiated, regulated, administered and developed by community leadership; and recruiting is done in the "concentrated community" by community recruiters, on the sidewalks, in the poolrooms, and all places where the unemployed "hang out." Industry is involved in every process of OIC's local development.

Recruits are then placed in a pre-vocational or "Feeder Program" where they are taught hygiene, poise, speech, self-pride, American heritage appreciation and adaptation to the "world of work." Trainees are then "fed" into OIC Skill Centers which are established with the assistance of industry, where students receive training in skills for jobs that are known to be available.

A subsidiary of OIC, the Adult Armchair Education Program, preassists by going into the community and into the homes of the indigenous where work is done to help people with the three Rs, American heritage appreciation, and other self-help personal and community development skills.

Of the 90 OICs under development as of December 1969, only 30 of the operating OICs were receiving comprehensive federal funding, the remaining 60 OICs for the most part, are totally dependent upon private sources of support.

If OIC could do what it has done in just a few years, with piecemeal, fragmented and uncertain funds, borrowing from Peter to pay Paul, and at the same time developing our capabilities and management skills as we go along, imagine what OIC could do for America if we were given ample funds to do the job it is clear we are able to do! I believe we deserve to have all America help us to "help ourselves."

The total funding of the 59 operating centers up to 1969 came to almost 25 million dollars, of which 21.8 million dollars came from government funding sources and 2.6 million dollars from private sources. This breakdown shows that about 88% of OICs operating income came from government sources, half of which was tri-agency—DOL, OEO and HEW and the rest, 12%—from business and foundation areas.

As far as the major reason for our existence is concerned the OICs of America graduated 33,463 trainees up to 1968, and another 15,653 in 1969, giving us a grand total of 49,116 graduates to-date from our 74 centers in 59 cities. The current enrollment for classes in January 1970, comes to 9,916. From 35 to 40,000 people will graduate during 1970 alone.

Our job placements through 1968 came to 17,141 with another 11,062 put into jobs in 1969, giving us a total of 28,203 graduates placed. More important the retention rate after 6 months on the job (based on a sample survey of graduates from 3 centers) came to 79% with only a small slippage to 76% after 1 year.

We can all be proud of these figures, for they signify among other things, that the OICs have come of age as a potent force for dealing with the training and placement of the disadvantaged and hard-core unemployed by returning them to a useful civic occupation.

The future will probably bring serious competition for the manpower dollar. Right now, the focus of manpower attention is upon the disadvantaged and so-called hard-core. OIC can continue to play a significant role in training and placing these groups of unemployed—of all colors—in the job market. Those of us in the national work are aware of potential competition for jobs in the market place from two large groups of potential workers.

One is from returning Vietnam Veterans, both black and white—who will be demanding equal access to available jobs, who will also have their well known Veterans preferences.

The other will be the hundreds of thousands of semi-skilled, blue collar workers, laid off by civilian defense industries and Military installations as the Pentagon continues to make necessary post Vietnam cutbacks. Government's attention and manpower dollars will be focused upon them.

OIC can and does serve as a catalyst in labor relations. Despite rumors to the contrary, that we only focus our efforts on the needs and desires of business and industry it is a fact that OIC is also labor oriented and conscious of its ties with the labor unions. We are conscious that the employer is not the only source of problems. Our instruction to trainees has always included union orientation and has encouraged active union participation where it is possible. The records of our former trainees now in full employment and membership in the organized labor force are symbols of this cooperation. Where union membership is a problem OIC must work on that problem. Continued good relations in the future between OIC and the unions are imperative in any efforts to increase our influence among the male population to get more male enrollees into our programs. The key is good available jobs at top pay and the fulfillment of the American dream of equal opportunity for the growth and development of each individual.

The immediate future projection of OIC is to train 100 thousand persons per year into useful jobs with upgrading possibilities. If OIC is provided the resources to train 100 thousand persons for jobs, it would mean a gain of $66 million dollars annually to the government in the form of welfare payment savings; and $200 million dollars annually in additional income. All of which would represent a broadened base of purchasing power for the nation. At the average cost of $1000 per trainee, the investment would be returned three dollars to one at the end of the first year.

I have a distant dream of what the OIC program might be like ten years hence—1980—if they are properly funded. I believe that if the federal, state and local governments, foundations and private enterprises were to invest some $300 million dollars a year in the OIC program in American cities throughout the country over the next decade, that over 2 million men and women could be trained for skilled productive jobs that would add more than $30 billion dollars in new incomes to the national economy, plus untold savings in relief and welfare checks.

This would mean a one thousand percent dividend in ten years for each dollar invested in the OIC across the United States of America.

The need actually is for OICs to be established like supermarkets in the neighborhood areas of our concentrated communities all over the country. A supermarket chain does not put one market in one city and another in another city; it locates the markets in every neighborhood, in every community where the need for food exists. OIC programs should be established in every neighborhood in every concentrated community in America, providing massive evening training programs, as well as daytime ones.

Upgrading of skills is just as important as training the underemployed, for the great need for jobs is not just among the so-called "hard-core unemployed" but among the millions who are willing to work now but ill prepared to meet the labor needs and demands of the day. We can lift the employment level of the underemployed and thereby provide an extra space for the hard-core unemployed. Otherwise, we may find ourselves in the position of trying to put a bushel of potatoes in a basket that is already filled with a bushel of wheat.

If supported and expanded into hundreds of smaller communities as we develop and prove our successes, it is conceivable that OICs could well promote such a rise in the economy and productivity of the nation as to lead to the seemingly impossible end of establishing national economic stability.

Through the medium of the OICs, the nation can turn the corner away from a rising "welfare" state for the disadvantaged, to a new "Workfare" state of self-help for all who are able to work and do a job.

In the event of possible recessions, the OICs would provide an essential "holding action" for the re-training and re-direction of individuals into public and private type job markets, and be a prime factor in the concentrated communities towards working helpfully and positively with the people in a time of national economic stress. Further, in such situations, OICs would aid in the development of para-professionals for community services, daycare work and other forms of educational programs that would be so vitally necessary for neighborhood rehabilitation projects.

It is also crucially important to know that OIC is vitally interested in the development of programs in our great rural areas. This is a necessity if we are to really solve the problems of our big cities. We can erase poverty in the big cities of America altogether, and in five (5) years have the same problem all over again—because of the migrants from the rural areas who will see what has happened in the large cities and view them as the places with "pots of gold."

Interestingly, the OIC program has made such an impact that the news of its work has spread around the world. To the effect that OIC programs are now in process of development in Nigeria, Ghana, and the Dominican Republic, and inquiries about the establishment of OICs are being received from all over the world.

It is my hope, therefore, that support for the Opportunities Industrialization Center type programs be specifically encouched without necessarily naming it, in new manpower legislation in order for the program to adequately and qualitatively do the job that it has already demonstrated it is capable of doing.

It is my hope that the expertise and services of the OIC National Program, which provide technical assistance to OIC developmental efforts, will be utilized more extensively to serve non OIC programs, should they desire that service, in order that the OIC techniques developed might be made more broadly available.

I can see how OIC type programs might be utilized in communities large and small where there is a need for skill manpower training and development in those particular communities. The program is organized in such a way that it can develop linkage with any institution, or group, public or private, operating anywhere, in order for the job to be done to "help people to help themselves."

In this respect I honestly feel that the bill should mandate a more positive participation of the Office of Education and HEW, at both of the national (Washington) and regional levels, both operationally and from the standpoint of committeed and active leadership. I believe that this is essential if we are to make any kind of in-depth, root attack on the problem of Black Americans and other minority groups.

For some time I have felt we are oversimplifying the dilemma of getting people into jobs. While I, of all people, certainly wouldn't want to underestimate the importance of the job in our value system, we have got to consider, also, the present and long-range goals of minority group Americans in a broader context. HEW, especially the Office of Education with its link to the educational community, is somewhat peculiarly suited, program-wise and philosophically, to work with the total human being and all of the myriad of conditions of mind and body resulting from years of deprivation and second class citizenship.

Those who understand the concept of OIC know that we are more than just a job training program. In OIC we are concerned with the whole human spirit. In our centers our aims and objectives we talk about "the whole man concept." That's why in Baltimore and other locations, reports show that there is less turnover of OIC graduates than with employees from other sources.

Another reason I am hopeful that this manpower bill will mandate more positive HEW and Office of Education involvement is that our OICs are just beginning to link up with the regular school systems across the country. The Office of Education is presently accelerating its efforts to have OICs funded through State Education agencies, while not destroying the distinct and basic characteristics of OIC as totally a community based program. While I am convinced that the remedial work we are doing with disadvantaged school dropouts is of great importance, as a realist I recognize that the really important goal for OICs and similar training groups is to influence change in the regular school systems and other Constitutional units of Government. Considering the funds from the property tax base and non-discretional Federal funds available to the regular school systems, we have go to work with them to achieve meaningful changes if we hope to enhance the quality of life for the 20 or 25 million Black Americans and for 10 million Spanish speaking Americans, and our many, many American Indians. I feel certain that it would be in the best interest of the people to be served, the taxpayers, and the Government if this Bill provided for stronger Office of Education/HEW leadership and a more natural link to the country's education community.

OIC has developed working relationships with many of the Employment Security agencies across America. This linkage has proven mutually beneficial and OIC is expanding these relationships wherever possible. Continuing linkages with the Employment Services will provide additional job opportunity exposure to OIC graduates. OIC is committed to complement the activity of the agencies rather than act as a competitor.

Through our advisory committees we have cultivated excellent contacts with the business community across the country. Hopefully, some of these contacts could also be used to build bridges linking the disadvantaged with the business community and with the State Education agencies and other elements of the community.

I repeat, as of now, of the 90 or more OIC projects and programs under development in the United States, only a third of them receive federal funds and even the flow of these funds for those federally supplemented programs is extremely poor.

It is my hope that specific consideration be given to broadening support to programs such as OIC through the appropriate federal agencies, into as many communities as possible, in order that a spirit of hope might come to the tens of millions of people shut out from the benefits of the free enterprise system due to lack of motivation, attitude, and adequate skill training, and other kinds of educational aids so crucially needed at this time!

TESTIMONY PREPARED FOR DELIVERY BY CONGRESSWOMAN SHIRLEY CHISHOLM BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT, MANPOWER, AND POVERTY, MARCH 19, 1970

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity of appearing before this subcommittee to support—with all the strength at my command—legislation designed to guarantee Federal funding for opportunities industralization centers throughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, approximately 25 million Americans are impoverished. Close to forty percent of the Black community fall into this category of desperate citizens who cannot afford the essential of a happy, healthy, full life. I speak to you, therefore, about a problem which is quite close to me physically as well as emotionally.

The sense of poverty that engulfs the individual; that isolates him from the community of the living, and that deadens his spirit is a feeling not easily comprehended by we who sit in this Chamber. And yet this unfathomable sense of despair and frustration is compounded to an even greater degree each time the unemployed or unskilled victim of poverty becomes aware that there are decent jobs available, each time welfare mothers discover that there is a training center just across town but travel and babysitter expenses prohibit taking advantage of its services.

In too many cases, Mr. Chairman, an escape from poverty can be facilitated but the nature of our anti-poverty programs make it much more difficult: so close and yet so far.

To illustrate this point, I have compiled a table showing the number of people unemployed in selected States as of November, 1969. I have also listed the amount of available jobs on record at the State employment offices at the same time. (I am told that the openings recorded by the employment offices usually represent anywhere from one-quarter to one-third of the total job availabilities.) I hasten to add that the table is not completely foolproof. Obviously there are several hidden variables such as temporary unemployment, openings for menial or unskilled jobs, and so on. Nevertheless, I feel that the table can and does show that in spite of available jobs, many people do without work. One must also introduce the fact that a large group of those who work do so for the minimum wage which—it must be stressed—yields an annual income below the already unrealistic poverty line set by the Federal Government. And all the while, there are higher paying jobs in the offing.

Now as you no doubt are aware, there are generally two methods for assimilating the unemployed or lowly employed into adequately paying work: Those oriented towards on-the-job experience and those which stress training. Opportunities industrialization centers, conceived in 1964 out of the awareness that there are jobs available and people to fill them if only they had the skill, are dedicated to the training approach.

It should be pointed out that the Heineman Commission Report to the President on Income Maintenance indicated recently that the training programs are more effective and economical than the work experience alternative. Furthermore, among available training programs, O.I.C.'s are far more economical than virtually any other. For while it costs the Government an estimated $3600 to train an individual, O.I.C. provides a more complete service at a national average of slightly more than $1000 per trainee. In our Brooklyn O.I.C. center the Federal cost per head is running at about $1,857. This higher cost in part reflects outlays for machinery, renovation of building space, and the like which are one-time investments.

Mr. Chairman, I will not recount for you the details of the O.I.C. program because I am certain that the committee members have familiarized themselves with the essentials. Moreover, permit me to mention several facets of the O.I.C. approach which I feel must be emphasized.

Too many of our present anti-poverty and manpower development programs are condescending in nature. They are initiated and administered, in many cases, by people whose main concern is removing guilt from their consciences rather than really helping those who need it. The result is a thwarting of the identity and a stifling of the enthusiasm of those who participate in the programs.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are exceptions. O.I.C. is an example of those programs which are genuinely concerned with the individual: with developing backbone, channeling drive, creating confidence—each so vitally necessary for "making it" in today's society. O.I.C. graduates have not been mass-produced. On the contrary, they have gone through a program which, to the greatest extent possible, attempts to cater its services to the individual needs of each participant. The class-room atmosphere of teacher-student relationships is de-emphasized while small, flexible, open discussions characterize the all-important feeder program. O.I.C.'s are not manned by patronizing instructors who instill an unnecessary and unhealthy dependence on themselves in their students. Rather, the O.I.C.'s are dedicated to the "self-help" philosophy best captured in the motto over the doors of one center: "If you cannot lift yourself by your own bootstraps because you don't have boots, O.I.C. will give you a pair."

There is a second aspect of the O.I.C. program which must be highly commended, Mr. Chairman. In my trips around the country, I have grown aware of the fact that too frequently our manpower development programs suffer from a lack of coordination. That is, men and women participate in programs and get trained for jobs which are not at all in demand in the city or environs in which the center is located; or, skills necessary for jobs open in a specific area are often not taught. At the same time, people have emerged from "training programs" prepared to do useless, time-wasting tasks.

Gentlemen, we have got to put an end to these types of irrelevant, ineffective programs. Now is the time to stop applying a series of isolated bandages to this sickness known as poverty, and begin to coordinate our treatment of this malaise before it overwhelms us. We must develop and fund programs that make sense, which train area people for area jobs, jobs that will not be obsolete by the time the trainee graduates.

Because of its close working relationship with the local entrepreneurial organizations, the O.I.C. training programs can be geared closely to the needs of business and industry in the area. In fact, each training subject is closely advised and partially directed by competent, dedicated men already established in their field. Graduates are therefore in great demand and can be quickly absorbed into the economic life of the community. A member of the Philadelphia O.I.C. remarked in 1966 that "support from the business community has become so great that failure of the O.I.C. would mean almost as great a disillusionment in the business community as in the Negro community."

A few figures will, I believe, demonstrate the effectiveness of the program and the worthiness of the cause. The centers have graduated 32,700 students in the past five years; 27,900 were placed in respectable jobs. The figures for Brooklyn are 3,310 enrolled (November 26, 1967–December 31, 1969) and 1,287 placed in jobs or referred to appropriate training programs. In 1969 alone, O.I.C. centers have graduated 13,100 and 10,900 have already been placed. The current enrollment is almost 10,000; slightly less than one-tenth of these are enrolled in one O.I.C. in my own borough of Brooklyn, where there is a waiting list of close to 5,000. Thus, Mr. Chairman, the demand for the program can be clearly seen.

Yet, another point must also be considered. Here in Washington, those who went through O.I.C. had an average income of about $1800 prior to coming to the program. Many were on welfare and few paid taxes. However, the O.I.C. graduates in the District currently have a combined economic power approaching $2.5 million. This trend has been duplicated all over the country. In my own Brooklyn centers the average number of welfare recipients who receive training in the day and evening programs is 201 (161 per day, 40 per evening). Additionally, about 39 of the people participating in day training are unemployment insurance recipients who are getting retraining or new training for another job.

The point is that appropriating Federal money for efficient, effective training programs, such as O.I.C., will not be lost at all. Training will mean fewer and fewer people on welfare rolls and greater and greater numbers contributing to the tax base. As has been pointed out by a chamber of commerce official in Philadelphia: "If you could double the Negro income in this country in ten years you would add a market the size of Canada—our largest foreign customer."

Up to this point, Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to zero in on several characteristics of the O.I.C.'s. It seems to me that the two basic elements of the opportunities industrialization centers—emphasis on self help and identity building, along with the relevant and effective training for available jobs—mark it as one of the most worthwhile training programs, one which has proven itself despite its short history, and one, therefore, for which Federal funds must be guaranteed.

I would like now, if I may, to concentrate on some crucial problems currently faced by the O.I.C.'s which it is imperative that this committee consider before acting—favorably it is hoped—on the proposed O.I.C. legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I have already stated that graduates of the program in 1969 are 40 percent of the total graduate body since the program began some 5 years ago. Yet in spite of the drastic increase in enrollment, the O.I.C. budget has not come close to keeping pace. In some cases, not only has there been a budget lag, but there has been no increase whatsoever over the last couple of years. What the limited resources mean in human terms is that the formation of additional or supplementary facilities has been prevented. The absence of these centers means that people eager for training but who cannot afford the travel or babysitter expenses have been unable to take advantage of O.I.C. services. It means that the Brooklyn center has a waiting list of 5,000 while I get calls by industries in my area begging me to send them skilled workers. This trend, Mr. Chairman, must be stopped. By inserting O.I.C. services right into the Manpower Training Act, O.I.C.'s can hopefully receive more Federal funds than if it were simply another program.

This brings me to the second problem. Up to this point, Federal aid to O.I.C.'s has come from various agencies and has been haphazard. There is never complete assurance of funding continuing for a full fiscal year. Centers throughout the country have been forced to operate on contingency plans from month to month. Planning for the future is virtually out of the question since there is rarely a long-term commitment to O.I.C.'s. They wait for an emergency before spending their meager resources resulting in far greater expenses than had they been able to look ahead and prevent certain inevitable things from materializing.

Moreover, it should be realized that O.I.C.'s, because of their success, have been stabilizing forces between inner-city residents and business and industry. But this stability can no longer be guaranteed if O.I.C. financing is not, itself, made more stable.

There is a further problem in this regard. Whenever the sporadic grants do come through, there is a time lapse before the money arrives. For example, the Brooklyn O.I.C. was awarded a $1.2 million contract from the Federal Government on June 24, 1967, but they didn't receive any money until Dec. 6, 1967. This type of delay makes an efficient operation of any organization most difficult. Again, this problem can be alleviated if federal financial assistance to O.I.C.'s is explicitly stated in the manpower act.

The third problem is one which disturbs me greatly and is one which must be reckoned with. I direct your attention to several phrases in Senator Bogg's bill S 1362 and his amendments to S 2838: "Such services shall include recruitment, counseling, remediation, vocational training, job development, job placement, and other appropriate services." The point is, Mr. Chairman, that the basic thrust of O.I.C. and the prime reason for its success has been its wholeness. O.I.C. is involved in the entire training process—from recruitment in bars and pool halls, to character and aptitude development, to guidance and follow through, and to "adult armchair education." The O.I.C. staff knows and relates to each participant over a period of time and as thoroughly as humanly possible.

Now it has come to my attention that because of supposed economic necessities, some Government agencies on various levels are attempting to incorporate the corresponding O.I.C. activity into their realm of responsibility. That is, for example, state employment agencies are tying to assume the placement function, schools are trying to take on the job of recruitment, and so on. This diffusion of O.I.C. functions appears to be going on in Oakland, Seattle, and—to some extent—in my own district, to name only a few victims of this encroachment.

In my view, if this is allowed to continue, it would totally destroy O.I.C. as an effective program. Its basis, I repeat, is its integral nature: Staff can relate to the individuals; they know them well and can, therefore, suggest individualized plans for their futures. This simply could not be duplicated by several agencies sharing heretofore solely O.I.C. responsibilities. Intra-agency communication is poor; "O.I.C. type" participants and government bureaucrats would find it difficult to relate to each other; and agencies could not give good advice based on their necessarily skimpy knowledge of the people involved.

After all, Mr. Chairman, the manpower training programs grew out of just this awareness: That government agencies were not executing these responsibilities effectively. We cannot afford to risk giving them another chance—by default or otherwise. For the human resources with which we are dealing are far too precious.

It is for this reason that I am extremely critical of the emphasis upon state employment agencies in the Nixon administration's family assistance plan. I repeat, the whole reason manpower programs came into existence in the first place in that the state employment agencies were not doing their jobs. It seems ludicrous to me to reward them for their failure just because it fits into someone's philosophical scheme of decentralization. It would be fine if it worked but it doesn't.

Since the inception of the various manpower programs, the state employment agency people have not been goaded into significant improvements.

If you think federal bureaucrats are difficult you ought to see them on the state and local level. The state employment agencies are limited in their thinking with respect to the real needs of people and many haven't the foggiest notion of what outreach or intensive recruitment is all about. Their offices are "downtown" not in the ghetto. If one works up the courage to go into their cold, uninviting offices, he will most likely be shuffled to one or more people; fill out a series of forms, wait; wait some more and then finally he will speak to some irrelevant civil service individual who will, with a touch of noblesse oblige; give him a list of instructions and referrals. If he tried to ask questions in Spanish or the non-standard English which is the linqua franca of the black ghetto, forget it, because he won't be understood. Recruitment, training, and placement should be part of a package and it must be ghetto oriented.

In reference to this whole decentralization theory which is in vogue now, I would like to make another point. At this time in an effort to decentralize the cumbersome Federal machinery and to get the decision-making process closer to the people concerned, the Labor Department has given a great deal more authority and responsibility to its regional offices. I think this is good and useful, but there are certain practical problems which must be considered. It means that in the south people who are interested in training programs for blacks must deal with people who are more susceptible to political pressure from State governments and people who themselves have a white southern point of view. This set-up inhibits the creation and functioning of black-oriented training programs. Aggressive, black-run and black-oriented programs simply won't get funded or refunded. This is already happening. I know because they come to me and the other nine black members for help. They come to us because they feel that the state government, regional office of the Labor Department, and their own representatives are not responsive or sympathetic.

If you are going to have this decentralization and the enhancement of the regional office, there ought to be a review procedure at the Federal level—a last court of appeal if you will. I am not putting the South down. I think an appeal procedure is necessary for people in all regions in the country, but we must recognize that there are special problems in the South. That is why the phase "southern strategy" is such a loaded one.

Another point is that the present administration is placing too much emphasis on the private sector in its manpower programs. For example the Department of Labor has cut back the out-of-school neighborhood youth corps program three times; the last time by one-third. These out-of-school slots did not go into the in-school neighborhood youth corps program. Instead the Labor Department has been funneling all these monies into the jobs program of the national alliance for business. I think business can and should play a bigger role in manpower training, but I also know that businessmen are not going to train the really hard-core. They are not going to initiate programs for ex-felons and ex-drug addicts or other people with serious problems.

Right now inflation and tight money have caused layoffs in our big industries. All those guys who were trained in the much-celebrated NAB programs in Detroit are being laid off. It is the old rule of last hired first fired.

It is just plain foolish to put all our eggs in one basket. We need a variety of manpower programs for a variety of needs.

Finally, I would like to point out the very real need for day care facilities to meet the needs of women workers. Day care facilities are necessary not only during the training program but later when the woman has found a job.

In the Brooklyn O.I.C. program the majority of the enrollees are women. The breakdown is: 1,405 men and 1,905 women. The directors of O.I.C. report that the highest rate of dropouts and absenteeism is due to the lack of child care facilities. If the babysitter doesn't show up or Tommy gets sick and has to go to the clinic, mommie has to take him.

We have 32 million working women and many more who want to work. We have five million pre-school children but only 641,000 day care spaces available. Many women, approximately 3 million, are rearing their children in fatherless homes. Among blacks, 24% of the families are headed by women. These women need jobs and in order to work they need adequate day care facilities.

As Elizabeth Koontz, of the women's bureau, has pointed out the lack of day care facilities has been the chief drawback in the implementation of the win day care program. It is not enough to provide stipends for day care. The stipend is no good if there are no day care centers. It is like giving someone grocery money where there is no grocery store. We need to spend money, big money, on facilities and teacher training for day care if we want our training and employment program to work.

This is the situation as I view it, gentlemen. Permit me to summarize my sentiments with this final observation: Opportunities industrialization centers were started in a jail house late in 1964 and have developed, within five years, into a many-faceted program which seeks to assist those whose lives have been marred by discrimination and poverty. It effectively enables its participants to rise above the squalor of the slums and to assume a control over their destiny.

An O.I.C. graduate once remarked that "it's like a year of storms and then all of a sudden the sun starts shining." Former President Johnson described O.I.C. as composed of a "spirit that wants to say 'yes' to life itself, that wants to affirm the dignity of man, whatever his origins, whatever his race, whatever his religion."

Mr. Chairman and members of this subcommittee, we cannot say "no" the spirit; we cannot let it die. Opportunities industrialization centers have proven themselves. They deserve our wholehearted support.

Thank you!

PUBLICATION OF DRUG COMPENDIUM NEEDED TO COUNTER EXORBITANT DRUG PRICES

HON. SEYMOUR HALPERN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to require the Federal Government to publish a listing of the generic equivalents of name brand prescription drugs. This would counter artificially high prices which are hurting consumers, especially the elderly.

There is no difference between a chemical composition drug and brand name drugs except the price.

This bill would provide for publishing a drug compendium with accompanying descriptions of drugs, price information, warnings, and evaluation of drug's efficacy. It would be made available to physicians and druggists, periodically updated, and financially supported by charging the drug firms on an equitable basis determined by the volume of their business.

It is ridiculous for consumers to pay for brand name drugs, because they can buy an identical prescription under its generic name for as much as 1,000 percent less. For example, a drug used to control high blood pressure is sold by its manufacturer for $7.50 per 100 tablets. Under its generic name, it can be purchased at 75 cents per 100.

Indeed, prescription drug prices have risen 50 percent in the last 10 years. The drug industry is spending $600 million a year to promote its products and it passes the cost onto the consumer.

This promotion includes advertising in medical journals, advertising sent directly to doctors, salesmen who personally call upon physicians urging them to use particular drugs, and widespread distribution of free samples of new drugs.

Drug firms spend $3,000 a year on each one of the Nation's more than 200,000 physicians—for a total of $600 million. That total exceeds by $100 million the amount spent by the same firms on new drug research.

Indeed, a recent study which focused on the leading 41 industries in this country found that the drug industry was first in profits in 6 of the 10 years ending in 1966. In the 4 years since then, their profits were not lower than third in rank.

Those hardest hit by exorbitant drug prices are the elderly. Senior citizens constitute less than 10 percent of the population, but account for 23 percent of the money spent on prescription drugs.

Physicians do not recommend generic equivalents because they are faced with a phenomenal assortment of drugs from which they must choose. They rely heavily on advertising and other promotional materials from drug firms for their information. This compendium would provide a comparative basis from which to choose more inexpensive, but effective prescription drugs.

There is not in existence today a comparative drug price list which the physician can use to choose the more inexpensive brand for his patients.

In 1968, Dr. Philip R. Lee, then Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare for health and scientific affairs, sent every doctor in the country a letter asking for their comments on the idea of having such a compendium published and made available to every doctor. Of those who replied to the letter, 77 percent favored the idea.

What my bill proposes, Mr. Speaker, is that such a compendium be created, kept up to date, and that the cost of printing it be charged to the drug firms on an equitable basis to be determined by volume of business conducted.

The compendium would also include a description of the drug, indications and contraindications, warnings, adverse reactions, and management of overdosage.

In an effort to drive down the ridiculously high price of prescription drugs and to protect consumers—particularly the elderly—from being fleeced, I would urge careful consideration of my proposal for a comprehensive drug compendium.

FREEDOMS FOUNDATION AWARD-WINNING SPEECH

HON. VANCE HARTKE

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, for the benefit of Members of Congress who have not had an opportunity to read it, I ask unanimous consent that the 1969 Freedoms Foundation award-winning speech by Mr. Brian L. Bex be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREEDOMS FOUNDATION AWARD-WINNING SPEECH

Shakespeare once wrote "The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves..."

There is a tragic irony that a country and a people as great as the United States and the great body of energetic and resourceful Americans should find themselves in a dilemma which every day becomes more manifest.

The greatest, richest, and most progressive nation in all history now stands like some ancient monument which is slowly eroding away under the action of the sands, the winds, and the weather.

Ours is a country whose gross national product in goods and services has reached a fantastic level of one trillion dollars this year. It is a country with more automobiles, more telephones, more automatic appliances, more people living on a standard of comfort than any other in the world.

But ours is a country sadly vexed and greatly beset. We mass produce everything in this country: everything except character.

It used to be that when you wanted something, you worked to earn it. Now you stage a riot and get it given to you at someone else's expense.

If your father or grandfather lost his job, he took whatever work he could get. Now hordes of relief "clients" refuse a job unless it is to their liking, and they demand the job be brought to them.

This nation was built by immigrants who struggled here for opportunity, and would have scorned the false idea of "something for nothing." Now it seems to be an almost universal (and all-too-often) ambition.

It used to take a lifetime of gruelling work and scrimping for a family or a country to earn a little surplus, a taste of security. Now mobs of so-called "students" and whole "emerging nations" demand they be given it, out of your earnings and with no effort on their part.

"Minority groups" all over the earth seem to think the world owes them everything they want.

Have you ever wondered what happened to the America of yesterday? Yesterday, you paid your debts as quickly as possible, and sacrificed to do so. You disciplined your children, but disciplined yourself, first. You spent less than you earned, and demanded your government do the same. You went to church, your children to Sunday school, you held daily prayers, and no court would have dared to interpose any law into your private religion. You would have been horrified at (and quick to change) men in high places who made "deals." You expected to prosper only by doing a better and better job. You obeyed the law, but took an active enough part in government to see that the laws were just. You "walked softly but carried a big stick." And that was the character which brought this country victory in three wars in your lifetime, built it back from a shattering depression and fed and saved the civilized world.

Today, America is becoming a nation of drifters so accustomed to turning to the government or someone else for help that it is losing its heritage of hard work, thrift, and above all, individual responsibility. The mood of today is to say: If we have a disaster, let the government declare us a disaster area and send help; if we get out of work, we have unemployment insurance; sooner or later, we will have Social Security, so why worry?

I do not think we can continue to function as a free society unless people take some sense of responsibility for themselves and their own future.

Morality, integrity, law and order, and other cherished principles of our great heritage are battling for survival in many communities today. They are under constant attack from degrading and corrupting influences which, if not halted, will sweep away every vestige of decency and orderliness remaining in our society.

Certain groups, numerically weak but vociferously strong, appear determined to destroy all acceptable standards of personal conduct and sane behavior patterns. They seem bent on eliminating all ethical practices relating to our established order.

It is becoming increasingly more apparent that a philosophy of the left (in all its shadings, from Communism to the welfare state to the "mixed economy" concept) can only be successfully fought by a positive philosophy of freedom. Ideas must be fought with other ideas, not emotions. It is not enough to know what one believes in, it is equally important to know why one holds certain convictions. An attack against a position is best met by a strong counterattack, whether the battle is one of physical force or the force of opposing philosophical and economic ideologies.

Clearly, it is time for each one of us to examine basic premises. It is time to reexamine our convictions and delve into the underlying reasons for them. Most of us know what our opinions are; it is just as important to discover where these opinions came from, what are the fundamental moral and philosophical premises on which they are based. It is time to stop fighting a defensive battle against leftist ideologies and turn the tide back with a strong showing of clear, rational, carefully considered ideas.

Most people are aware that our way, the American way of life, is being seriously challenged—that if something isn't done, things will get worse instead of better. There may not be agreement on which issue or issues are the most crucial, but among those most frequently mentioned are apathy, conformity, lack of a sense of responsibility, racial conflict, inflation, internationalists, socialism-Communism, juvenile delinquency, automobile accidents, government spending, monopoly union, foreign competition, and the like.

Yet, we find even those persons most seriously concerned asking this question: "But what can I do about it?" I'd like to have a nickel for every time I have heard this expression from those who earn more than I do. I say it this way to emphasize the fact that so many people, whose capabilities in business fields far exceed mine, plead full ignorance in the all-important business of fulfilling their duty as American citizens.

Salesmen who make hundreds of contacts before they make a sale, advertisers who are happy with a few orders per thousand broadsided mailed, fishermen who will go to any lengths in the mere hope of landing the big one, become very different people when it comes to performing their civic duties. Here, they seem to expect immediate and overwhelming results with a minimum of effort. They underestimate the competition. The grafter, the subversive, and the special interest groups have much to gain by imposing their wills upon legislators and upon the public; and what they gain is immediate. You and I, who want the blessings of liberty secure for ourselves and our posterity, perhaps are less aware of what we gain by defending and advancing Americanism.

Whatever the reason, the fact remains: People seem to like to believe they can't do anything—so they do nothing, yet, what each person is capable of doing, and has the ability to do, is most substantial.

First, you must have an opinion, as soundly based and firmly established as possible. Second, you must see that this opinion is expressed in public, for an unknown opinion has no more value than any other form of unknown wealth.

Most of us aren't going to hire a hall, put on our own TV show, or even write a book. But we can, at least in conversations, say we are not convinced (when we aren't), and let those who have made a good point know that we think they have done well. Even those who would remain least involved can do this much.

You are busy, but you do read widely to keep informed. Good! As you read, mark articles, underline cogent phrases, check summarizing paragraphs. Then, send these on to others. If you have the time, include a note such as, "This also confirms what you said," or "You may be right, but there does appear to be another side." Formal letters of transmittal are seldom necessary. Just mail these materials where you think they would do the most good.

You may doubt the effectiveness of this technique until you see an editor, to whom you have sent a mailing or two, permanently change his policies; or a legislator change his vote on an issue. Or, a friend who has been in disagreement with you will come around one day and say: "You know that last item you sent really has something to it. I never thought of it that way."

If most of us did just this much, the principles and institutions of Americanism wouldn't be as contorted and corroded as they are now. Of course, you could go much further. You could refrain from letting purely commercial considerations "force" you to contribute and support movements and actions that you know are wrong. You could initiate correspondence with governmental officials, trade association executives and editors.

No matter how "big" or "small" you may consider yourself, realize that you may be the sole initiator of an idea—and that if you stop, everything stops. And this works both ways; for others need support, too. This you can do. You can support those who are supporting that which you believe is right.

The big question is not, "What can I do about it?" But rather, "How can I possibly afford not to do something?"

In this business of being a citizen, start! Keep moving! And you'll find you have really begun to "do something about it."

You see—today too many of us believe in the free enterprise system until the going gets tough—

We need a new dedication, a renewed devotion to our American private enterprise system.

There is no room for a Doubting Thomas. The preacher who wishes to preserve freedom of religion must also be a fighter for our free enterprise system, without any buts!

We have a responsibility to fight against the slow erosion of our free enterprise system. To preserve the right to our American heritage we must work harder at our responsibilities. We must oppose the "gimme" pressure groups and the political "handerouts." We must militantly challenge the philosophy that government can do everytihng for us and charge the bill to others. There are no others—they are you. We must stand, as individuals, for the right to own, to save, to invest in our free enterprise system. Without this freedom, other freedoms will soon be of little value.

Freedom is not hereditary.

Freedom has a price: and that price is vigilance.

The time has come for us to reestablish the rights, for which we stand—To reassert our unalienable rights to human dignity, self-reliance—To be again the kind of people who once made America great. And how shall we approach this problem? And will our answer be the needed vaccine for the rendering important of the collectivist cancer? I think it shall. I think the answer lies in this:

Today in America, everyone is a negativist, i.e., one who is anti: anti-Communist, anti-Nazi, anti-federal aid to education. Now there is little wrong with being a negativist, except when it prevents the same from being constructive. You see, the first thing a person is going to ask you when he knows you are anti-something is: "What are you for? What do you believe in?" No fairer question could be presented. Now the problem arises due to the fact that those of the anti-grouping seldom can find the answer to this all-important question. What do you propose? This is the very problem. Not what a person is against, but what he is for; not anti, but pro; an alternative, something better, not merely more of the same, under a different label.

I suggest that we become pro-free enterprise, pro-capitalism, rather than anti-Communism. Now for the person who understands the systems in question, he will readily understand and realize that to be for one, you by definition must be against the other. To be a Communist, you must be against capitalism. Rather than talking about the evils of collectivism, speak on the benefits of capitalism, the advantages of living in a free enterprise, competitive society.

You see, Americans in general regard the collectivist system, no matter what the "isms," as something alien and unrelated to America, and in turn we would never join the Socialist or Communist parties.

Yet, we clamor loudly for every piece of socialistic legislation which is offered—so long as it is sugar-coated with an American label or wrapped in the American Flag.

It seems to me that this must be very disheartening to sincere socialists to note the continuing impotence of their party, while, at the same time, a pseudosocialism in free enterprise wrapping has been able to command such a tremendous following from the rank and file. This is indeed a sad commentary on the political and economic ignorance of the American people.

We dismiss socialism with a wave of the hand, and then line up in droves behind Social Security, socialized medicine, industry, housing, and education. We denounce collectivism, and yet innocently and ignorantly spout its doctrines day in and day out. The reason for this is so simple that we Americans often overlook it: We just do not understand our own system. We as Americans do not understand capitalism, which just happens to be the only system devised by man which allows for human freedoms and justice in the same breath.

There is little question that the collectivistic proposals seem logical, just, and humanitarian. They sound like the idealistic answer for a muddled world's prayer. In one breath, they denounce the slavery of totalitarianism and the "crazy quilt of capitalism," and offer the Utopian "middle way," which eliminates the liabilities and retains the assets of both collectivism and individualism. It is all very intoxicating and consoling—until one realizes that oil and water do not mix. When one arrives at this conclusion in the discussion, the proponent of such a heaven and earth begins to delete himself from the dialogue.

Address those who would replace our system with collectivism: Mr. Collectivist: Show me! Show me a spot of God's green earth where collectivism has increased individual freedom and eliminated poverty. Show me where it has not meant rigorous and arbitrary regulation. Show me where it has proved the road to escape to true freedom as well as to peace and plenty. Show me your Utopia, not on paper, but in reality! You admit in your writings that socialism in Germany, Italy, and Russia resulted in Nazism, Fascism, and Communism, but you say that these were perversions of true socialism—and you abhor them. That is fine; I do, too. But show me where socialism has avoided these pitfalls and led to freedom and prosperity for everyone, as your blueprints say it will. Show me!

Despite the continued emphasis on increased production via collectivism, we can find no examples of such results in proof. All on paper, nothing in reality. Show me a socialized or even a half-socialized country which has remotely approached our free enterprise record of production and plenty. Show me a socialized or half-socialized country which has produced a higher standard of living for workers than capitalistic America. Show me where socialism has produced cheaper cars, telephones, radios, movies, gadgets and comforts, and where they have been more widely distributed among the average people. Show me a collectivist society where 72 percent of the population have life-insurance policies and 49 percent have bank accounts. If you know a better, happier, more envied workers' republic than we have right here in America, where is it? Please show us.

To this the collectivist has no answer. And why? He knows that capitalism and free enterprise have made it this way. This system, based on individual initiative and profit, has produced the best for the most. Socialists and Communists make the same mistake: They place security ahead of freedom. America is the prime example of a nation which founded itself on the basic principle of individual freedom. Our Constitution bristles with limitations upon the government—and the result has been (exclusive of the last thirty years) a greater measure of security for Americans than for all other nations. America offers unlimited rewards for initiative, enterprise, and wisdom, and she must never guarantee the same for laziness, incompetence or failure. This free way of life is a rugged, painful business at times; but it has paid the biggest dividends on earth and is well worth every weary mile of it.

You see, freedom appeals to men's strengths; socialism and Communism appeal to man's weaknesses. Freedom teaches a man to stand independently on his own feet; the others teach him to lose himself in the protective herd.

Our argument for capitalism is that America has proved beyond any doubt that she has the best economic and political system yet devised. This is proven by our glorious record, not by some hypothetical blueprint that some over-educated-under-worked humanitarian visioned in a dream. America did not become the bread-basket, the factory, the bank, and the hope of the world by following the wrong systems or believing the wrong principles. Her solution is visible in every home, in every city, in every store, in this country.

For you see, when the 55 men went to Philadelphia in 1787, they had a dream. It was with great courage and conviction that they hoped to form an enduring basis of government for the nation which had been a-borning and whose future destiny and greatness existed only in their minds as a vision. These men agreed and disagreed—there was argument and counter-argument. There was anger and there was calm thought. There was prayer and there was blasphemy. Finally there was compromise, the final product of their toil being the Constitution of the United States of America—a profound composite of their highest judgment and aspirations.

The Constitution having been completed, an arduous task lay ahead. These "salesmen of democracy" had to sell their product to the people whom they represented. A man must have confidence in the value of the product he is marketing. These 55 men had faith in the Constitution, yet they knew that it takes much more than faith to sell a concept.

Despite the many handicaps they had to overcome in communication and transportation, Madison, Franklin, Hamilton, and their colleagues, sold their product to the people of the young nation.

In the intervening years since 1789, many events of great political importance have occurred. Systems of government have risen and fallen. Yet in this time period, the Constitution of the United States has remained the most prominent expression of the American ideal of freedom and justice. Yes, the years have confirmed the founding fathers faith in their product.

For nearly two centuries, this Constitution has been the efficient framework within which a free and vibrant people have been able to realize their fullest potential.

In every period of our history, outside forces have tried unsuccessfully to weaken our democratic structure. During times like these, past generations of dedicated Americans, including our fathers and grandfathers, have reaffirmed their faith in democracy and their devotion to country. Many Americans have given their lives so that others might be able to pick the fruits of a bounteous nation. In war and peace, they have dedicated themselves to solving the problems of a growing nation. Our democratic framework is a stimulating atmosphere for their free quest for knowledge.

In order for our nation to continue resisting destructive influences, my generation must also be willing to re-affirm its faith in America. Our men in Vietnam are fighting to preserve free choice, and our students are sharpening their minds and skills in order to deal with the problems of an increasingly complex society. Despite the overwhelming loyalty of the majority, a minority of young Americans are evoking a genuine concern by their apathy and inane dissension.

You often hear it asked: But, how can citizens show America how it feels? How can the youth of America and their elders express their appreciation for the riches of opportunity and fulfillment that this country has provided? We, you and I, can participate, actively, in civic affairs. We can become operating members of the brain trust so vital to the success of our nation. For if America should fall to the collectivist disease, if she should die from bread and circuses, the epitaph of her gravestone may read as follows:

Here lies the only civilization which perished at the peak of its power, with its power unused.

Here lies a decent people who wanted love, not empire, and got neither; who tried to trade power for popularity and lost both.

Here lies a nation of advertisers who know how to change consumer tastes in cigarettes, but were themselves manipulated on all the issues that really mattered to their salvation and survival.

Here died a sort of Lancelot in the court of nations, who granting all his grievous flaws, was still somehow the noblest knight of all; except this Lancelot, crippled with an undeserved guilt complex, let his weapons and ideals fall unused, and so condemned all mankind to the thousand-year night of the Russian bear and the Chinese dragon.

Ladies and gentlemen:

The future of America lies in the hands of my generation. It is an awesome responsibility, but the obligation has been accepted by generations before us. The commitment is now ours. Of the many duties in this endeavor, the most vital to America's future lies in salesmanship. We must believe in our nation enough to go out and sell its principles to those outside our domain and to the apathetic within, so that future generations will have the drive to sustain the "Voice of America."

To sell America to American youth and American youth to America—this is the opportunity and this is the challenge. The generation that accepts this challenge will change the history of the world.

I thank you!

A MARINE SPEAKS OUT

HON. GEORGE A. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, long hair seems to be the vogue today, apparently symbolic of many youths who are short on order, loyalty, and contentment.

About 25 years ago there was a type of young man who characterized our youth of that time. His hair was short, but his dedication to God, his loyalty to country, and his respect for law and order were, indeed, long.

Fearing that this quite remarkable and very unique youth of not-too-long-ago might be forgotten, Mr. Robertson Page, an officer of Franklin National Bank of New York, wrote an interesting article that recaptures this youth of yesterday and introduces him to us again.

Mr. Page's article appears in a recent issue of the publication Banking under the title "A Marine Speaks Out." I submit for inclusion, the article in the RECORD, strongly recommending that everybody read it and ponder it deeply, lest they forget:

A MARINE SPEAKS OUT

(By Robertson Page)

Hey you! Yes, you with the beard and long hair and marijuana! Sorry, I didn't know they called it "grass" these days. You see, I just haven't been around much lately. Not since I was killed more than 25 years ago at a place called Wake Island.

You might say I'm on temporary leave from my grave. I've heard a lot of things about you and I wanted to see you for myself.

For example, I understand you accuse my generation of hypocrisy. Therefore, I assume you mean me.

Could be, Long Hair, I really don't know.

What I do know is that I was plenty scared when that Jap lunged at me with a fixed bayonet. Because that was the end of everything for me.

I also admit to being a little scared when I enlisted in the Marine Corps in wartime. But I did enlist—because I loved my country.

Now I learn that you don't care much for my country! I hear you have a demeaning word for it—something about "the Establishment." And that some of our newspapers support you in your infamy.

More than 30,000 tides have washed over the sandy beaches near my grave at Wake, and 25 years is a long time. But I never expected this. Not in America!

I further understand that you burned your draft card and ran for the sanctuary of a church. That others fled to Canada to escape the draft.

All in the name of Idealism!

It also has come to my attention that some of your bearded friends burned the American Flag in New York's Central Park. That must have been a real blow at hypocrisy!

Perhaps I'm too severe on you. It just so happens that my grave is quite shallow and I hear many things.

For one, I understand you have led violent demonstrations for the right to use four-letter words. That's a joke, pal! We Marines invented them! But, I'll tell you one thing we didn't do; we never regarded them as a constitutional right.

And I hear you demand a voice in running the universities. Gosh! I guess you must be pretty smart to know more than the professional educators!

I also hear that in the summer of 1969 more than 400,000 of you went to a "rock festival" in the Catskills, living off narcotics and group sex and having a real ball, while your peers were getting killed fighting Communists in Vietnam.

You know, it used to be that people back home rolled bandages for the men up front. I don't think I like your response very much. But forget that. I knew so many dedicated, wonderful guys who died for their country at Wake—and at Anzio and Iwo Jima and Omaha Beach and Bastogne—that I can't get very upset over a draft card burner.

But I'll tell you one thing that I find repulsive.

In all of the disruptive protests you have fomented on the campus, you have consistently tried to destroy those institutions that have made the United States strong against its enemies—ROTC, military recruitment, and research to strengthen our national security.

It makes me wonder about you. Are you an unwitting pawn of the enemy? Or just unthinking?

That's for someone else to decide. Right now, my moment is up and I must get back to Wake Island; this time forever.

In parting, I like to think that my death was not a waste; that in supporting my country on this narrow strip of sand I defended something worthwhile for a new and better generation of Americans.

But now that I've seen you, I begin to wonder. Perhaps I should have fled to Canada!

On second thought, I'm glad death came when it did.

You see, when I left this world I held a special belief, something you idealists would call square. It consisted of a deep-seated reverence for my God, for my heritage, for my parents, and for my country.

No one can take this from me. Not even in death.

I pity the fact that you choose not to share this belief, to express this simple faith in America.

ARIZONA/HAWAII STUDENT EXCHANGE OPERATION OPPORTUNITY

HON. PAUL J. FANNIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, on March 18, 20 fifth-grade students from Waianae, Maile, and Nanakuli left Hawaii to spend 2 weeks as exchange students in Steamboat Rock, Ariz., which is located on our Navajo Indian Reservation. On April 23, Navajo and Hopi Indian fifth graders will arrive in Hawaii to spend 2 weeks as exchange students.

Both States view this exchange as a cultural and educational experience that will be valuable not only for the students involved, but also for their families, their communities, and their parents.

I ask unanimous consent that newspaper articles published in the Honolulu newspapers and a resolution of the Senate of Hawaii be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the articles and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 154

Resolution congratulating the Leeward Cultural Exchange and KHVH–TV for their roles in establishing a student exchange program for Waianae

Whereas, on March 18, 1970, twenty fifth grade students from Waianae, Maili and Nanakuli will leave Hawaii to spend two weeks as exchange students in Steamboat Rock, Arizona, which is located within a Navajo Indian reservation; and

Whereas, on April 23, 1970, twenty Navajo and Hopi Indian fifth grade students will arrive in Hawaii to spend two weeks as exchange students in Waianae; and

Whereas, this exchange is the first exchange ever made between children from Hawaii and children of American Indian ancestry; and

Whereas, these visits will result in valuable cultural and educational experiences not only for the children involved, but also for the parents of the children involved and other adults in the community; and

Whereas, the Leeward Cultural Exchange was formed for the purpose of promoting and developing this student exchange, and KHVH–TV led the fund drive for this exchange program under the name of "Operation Opportunity"; and

Whereas, more than $8,000 was raised from the community in order to make this exchange economically possible; now, therefore

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1970, that the Leeward Cultural Exchange and KHVH–TV be and they hereby are congratulated for their roles in establishing a student exchange program in Waianae; and

Be it further resolved that certified copies of this Resolution be transmitted to Edward J. McGrath, President of the Leeward Cultural Exchange, and Lawrence S. Berger, President of KHVH–TV.

NAVAJO LAND BECKONS LEEWARD YOUNGSTERS

Twenty Leeward Oahu fifth graders will leave next week to spend two weeks living and going to school in a little Navajo Indian settlement named Steamboat Rock, Arizona.

The trip, which will be countered in April by a visit of 20 Navajo youngsters to Leeward, was dreamed up by two federal Teacher Corps volunteers and was made possible by enthusiastic community support.

The idea started last year when Edward J. McGrath and Craig Thompson joined the Teacher Corps together.

Teacher Corps is a federally funded program that sends non-education college graduates to various areas to help local teachers innovate new out-of-the-classroom programs.

McGrath was sent to Leeward and Thompson was sent to the Arizona Navajo Reservation. The two threw around the idea of a cultural exchange and decided to sound out their respective communities on the idea.

"Everyone was really enthusiastic about the idea," McGrath said. "Both the Leeward and Navajo people have very definite and unique cultural features and both are very proud of them."

So the Leeward Cultural Exchange was formed and an appeal for funds locally brought an immediate community response that resulted in the donation of the $8,401 necessary for the Leeward youngsters to make the trip.

KHVH–TV led the fund drive under the name "Operation Opportunity."

The group will leave a week from Wednesday at 11:30 a.m. on Continental Airlines flight 766. The public is invited to see them off.

Steamboat Rock is in Northeastern Arizona, about 160 miles northeast of Flagstaff. It is in the center of the Navajo Reservation and sits on the outskirts of the Hopi Reservation, which is surrounded by Navajo land.

The Leeward students will stay at Toyei Boarding School, which is just outside Steamboat Rock. The boarding school houses both Navajo and Hopi children, who live there during the school week and go home on weekends.

Activities include visits to the hogans (mud dwellings) of Navajo families, visits to such scenic and cultural attractions as the Grand Canyon, and a visit to Disneyland on the way home.

WAIANAE KIDS READY FOR A SWAP WITH THE INDIANS

(By Bob Krauss)

Mrs. Roy Yamada out in palm-shaded Waianae is knitting a pair of woolen mittens for her fifth-grade son, Derek.

Mrs. Elizabeth Saragosa at Maili (where the temperature averages 75 degrees) bought a pair of flannel pajamas last week for her 10-year-old son, Jeffrey.

Mrs. Herbert Amina in tropical Nanakuli, mother of 10-year-old Brian Amina, is shopping for a warm jacket.

These cold weather activities popped up on the sun-splashed Waianae Coast yesterday where 20 mothers are preparing their kids for a trip to Arizona. There they will spend two weeks on the Navajo Reservation.

Last night the temperature in Navajoland was below freezing.

That's not the only problem facing Waianae mothers.

"I have twins," said Mrs. Raymond Rodrigues. "My daughter, Ramy, was chosen to make the trip but her sister, Raelene, isn't going. They've never been separated before. I don't know how they'll take it."

A fifth-grader from Makaha, who has never been away from Hawaii, is concerned about visiting the reservation because of snakes.

"Don't worry," her teacher told her. "You wouldn't stop swimming in the ocean just because of the sharks out there, would you?"

The trip to Arizona begins a week from tomorrow and marks the beginning of the first cultural exchange ever attempted between kids from Hawaii and American Indians.

For more than a month the Waianae Coast community has been raising funds to meet the budget of $8,401.65.

"We now have $8,000 cash in hand with pledges for the rest," said Edward McGrath, president of the Leeward Cultural Exchange, sponsoring organization. "We are still taking donations.

"Any money we get beyond our own budget will be used to help the Indian kids come to Hawaii."

McGrath said the Leeward children are hoping to accept an invitation to visit a session of the State Legislature this week. Meanwhile they are practicing Hawaiian songs and dances after school every Monday and Wednesday.

"We had a picnic in Makaha on Sunday," McGrath said. "The kids performed for their parents."

Robert Moore, principal of Waianae Elementary School, said the significance of the cultural exchange is that it will be a carefully planned and supervised educational experience.

"This isn't like sending another baseball team to Disneyland," said Moore. "The object of this trip is education. Our kids have been having two classes a week since Jan. 28 in Hawaiian language, dance, music, arts and crafts, history.

"They've heard Navajo speakers, seen movies about the Navajo Reservation so they'll have some idea of what to expect. I'm hoping this will turn out to be a pilot program for other exchanges in the future."

The kids put on a car wash in Waianae two weeks ago to help raise money for the trip. They made $100. Donations have come in from all over the State.

Movie actor Richard Boone collected over $800 by passing a calabash in Waikiki night clubs.

On the reservation, McGrath said, the kids will visit Navajo hogans (mud houses), attend class with Navajo fifth-graders, perform hulas, tour the Grand Canyon, go on a hayride, see Indian dances and ride horses. They will spend a day at Disneyland on the way home.

A group of Navajo fifth-graders will arrive in Hawaii April 23 for the second half of the exchange.

McGrath said Leeward parents are now signing up to house the children during the two-week stay. They will go swimming and fishing, attend a luau, tour the Island and attend school with the Leeward youngsters, McGrath said.

Donations can be mailed to Leeward Cultural Exchange, P.O. Box 1017, Waianae, Hawaii 96792.

NATION CANNOT AFFORD POSTAL REFORM DELAY

HON. CHARLES E. CHAMBERLAIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, leading mid-Michigan newspapers, the Jackson Citizen Patriot, and the State Journal of Lansing devoted extensive editorials on the current postal crisis. As ways are being sought to resolve not only the questions raised by the illegal work stoppage, but to bring about the badly needed reform of the entire postal system, I believe these commentaries deserve wider circulation, and I commend them to the attention of my colleagues. The editorials follow:

[From the State Journal, Mar. 22, 1970]

NATION CANNOT AFFORD POSTAL REFORM DELAY

Nobody, least of all members of Congress, should have been surprised by the postal strike which hit various parts of the nation last week and threatens a complete breakdown of the U.S. mail system.

The strike, of course, is in violation of federal law and now raises the unhappy question of what the government will do to enforce that law against thousands of workers who left their jobs last week.

It is a crisis that might well have been avoided if Congress had stopped the political footdragging of recent years and faced up to the issue of postal reform.

A strong effort to bring about that reform started under the administration of President Johnson when he appointed a special commission to come up with a plan to revitalize the obsolete and deficit-ridden postal operations. The commission made its study and came back with a call for reorganization of the Post Office Department on a self-governing basis as a non-profit government corporation.

The plan, which called for a corporate business style operation, was designed to make the postal system self-supporting within five years. It received strong bi-partisan backing across the nation and was subsequently endorsed by President Nixon when he took office.

Among those who backed the proposal were former Democratic Postmaster General Lawrence F. O'Brien and former Republican National Committee chairman Thruston B. Morton, as well as many members of both major political parties.

Yet, when the plan reached Congress last year it bogged down in committee and failed to get off the ground. In addition, Congress has failed to act on the President's $175 million request for postal pay increases. Perhaps most aggravating of all is the point noted by postal union officials that Congress has still taken no action on a 5.4 per cent wage hike that was supposed to have taken effect last October.

Some breaking of the ice started about 10 days ago when the House Post Office Committee finally approved the bill designed to turn the postal service over to a government-owned corporation.

A vote on the bill was delayed until after the Easter recess. The Senate, meanwhile, is still wrestling with its version of the same bill. It is obvious that certain key members of congressional committees are most reluctant to give up their traditional political influence over the postal system. Progress seems to come by inches.

It has been demonstrated by long and careful research that the present postal system is obsolete and due for overhaul. Figures released last year pointed out that the Post Office has a $1.2 billion deficit and this is expected to increase steadily in the years ahead.

One Michigan congressman stressed that the fault is not with local clerks and letter carriers, but with a lack of updated and efficient management systems.

Under proposals in the present House bill, a postal service authority would be established under a bi-partisan 13-member executive council representing postal union, mail users and the public. It would permit collective bargaining with binding arbitration. Strikes would still be prohibited.

All postal workers would still be protected by civil service, salary step increases would be reached in a shorter period of time.

In short, the plan would sever the historical and political relationship between Congress and the Post Office Department. Among other things the postal corporation could set mail rates, finance itself and still draw on tax revenues for help.

It has also been noted that the plan does not set any precedents. Government owned corporations such as the Tennessee Valley Authority and Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation have been in operation for many years.

Unfortunately, the rash of postal worker walkouts has now created another headache on the question of how the federal government is going to deal with an illegal strike. Hopefully, current negotiations between the government and postal union officials will bring about a compromise settlement.

Meanwhile, it is clear that the time has arrived for Congress to start moving on the long overdue issue of postal reform.

[From the Jackson Citizen Patriot, Mar. 21, 1970]

POSTAL SYSTEM NEEDS OVERHAUL

The problems of the United States Postal system have been piling up for years and now they are coming to a head with the walkout of mailmen in New York City and across the country.

Whether moves to end the walkouts will be effective remain to be seen.

The militant local of the National Association of Letter Carriers in New York City ostensibly walked off their jobs as a demand for higher pay in a city that costs more to live in than any other city in the United States.

Since federal employes are forbidden to strike, the walkout is illegal. Militant union leaders, however, aware that defiance of the law in these times is one of the best ways to capture an objective, are ignoring restraining orders issued by the federal courts.

As one postal official admitted:

"You can't jail thousands of workers."

Indeed you can't and trying to jail the leaders would probably only inflame the situation.

Postal workers, like other federal employees, have their wages set by Congress. The Letter Carriers Union negotiates with Post Office Department officials who in turn pass on the appeal to Congress.

Since the postal workers are forbidden to strike, they have little clout in their dealings with postal officials or Congress.

The threat of a strike is the ultimate weapon wielded by unions in their negotiations with management. Without that weapon, the postal workers have had to accept what pay raises a fickle Congress wants to grant.

There is sound reasoning behind not allowing federal employes to strike as the present situation dramatically shows. In most cases it means the stoppage of functions vital to the public interest.

So many of the everyday functions of our government are taken for granted that we are just not aware of what it is like to be without them until they are halted.

Halting the flow of mail is creating crises in both the public and private sector of proportions never thought of before.

Pensioners are being deprived of their meager paychecks, Wall Street business is seriously threatened, companies are unable to send out their billings or collect money due them.

The seriousness of the situation indicates that there must be a drastic overhaul of the postal system. A recent blue ribbon report called for making the mails a public corporation rather than a government agency with a responsibility for making it a financially sound operation.

The rank and file postal worker opposed the move, fearful that the long history of postal patronage jobs and political power in Congress would be abandoned.

That left the postal workers right back where they started—dependent on Congress for annual wage increases and benefits.

The postal system does not pay for itself. The annual appropriation to subsidize the system grows each year. It is woefully in need of overhauling to make it more efficient. Postal workers, indeed should be making more money. There should be no need to work a second job to support a family.

If the system is to pay its own way without a subsidy from Congress then postal rates would have to be jacked to new heights.

The postal system like the railroad system, has been allowed to decline during the 20th Century with little attention to the decay process.

Now the problems are coming to a head.

Postal workers, long underpaid in relation to other civilian jobs, need an immediate pay raise.

Then Congress needs to bite the bullet and launch an overhaul of the postal system, cutting out patronage along the way, to insure that the taxpayer who subsidizes the postal operation is getting the best deal for his money.

And the postal unions which have resisted change in their conclave need to be awakened to the fact that if they are to expect pay increases commensurate with their longevity and ability then some of the money has just got to come from tightening up much of the wasted money in the postal system.

CRISPUS ATTUCKS DAY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to pay tribute to the memory of one of America's black heroes. On that great day in Boston when the colonies dissolved forever the oppressive ties of colonialism, Crispus Attucks was there to take up the cause of freedom for all men. As he led that charge against tyranny, his mind was focused on the higher good which all men should count as their inalienable right. His blood was among the first to be shed so that America might be born. Let us all remember what Crispus Attucks gave his life for, and never lose sight of our continuing battle for the self-determination of all men.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. HENRY HELSTOSKI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Speaker, 52 years ago, the people of Byelorussia proclaimed their independence through the establishment of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. This great event in the lives of the Byelorussian people took place on March 25, 1918, and signified the unquenchable thirst for freedom by gallant people who were under constant Russian oppression.

The known history of the Byelorussian people dates back to the ninth century. Also known as the White Russians and White Ruthenians, these people settled in the area south of the Baltic countries, north of Ukraine and east of Poland. They had their own distinctive language and culture.

In the 18th century the Byelorussian lands were seized by the czars. Briefly, between 1918 and 1921, they enjoyed a productive freedom but soon the Russian Communists seized control of Byelorussia and ever since the Soviet bear has tried to stamp out the national spirit and national culture. Since then the Byelorussians have had no way to assert their national identity. Being denied their individual history, culture, and national pride, they are simply a ward of the Kremlin, which through its ruthless rulers has annihilated more than 6 million of the Byelorussian population.

Today's Byelorussia does not maintain diplomatic relations with other nations and is not permitted to have a distinctive identity. The Byelorussian delegation to the United Nations is merely a rubberstamp for the U.S.S.R.

The drive for russification continues relentlessly, with young people being educated in Russia, Byelorussian literature is ever on the decrease, the rising rate of use of the Russian language in schools, severe religious persecution and the mass transfer of educated and technically trained citizens to other parts of the Soviet empire.

Discrimination and persecution continue, but those who have fled the slavery are keeping alive the flame of freedom for their country of national origin.

This 52d anniversary of Byelorussia's proclamation of independence is a fitting time to commemorate those who have given their lives in the name of freedom as well as those in the free world who today continue their untiring effort to give strength and hope to the Byelorussian people behind the Iron Curtain.

Those of us who enjoy liberty won for us by our forefathers join the patriotic Byelorussians in the United States in observance of their independence day. The Declaration of Independence of Byelorussia was a modern, inspiring document, and its spirit continues to inspire the people as they patiently bear Communist oppression.

Mr. Speaker, to help commemorate this historic anniversary, I include as part of my remarks the text of the Third Constitutional Act which established Byelorussian independence:

PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE—THE THIRD, CONSTITUTIONAL ACT

One year ago the people of Byelorussia, jointly with the peoples of Russia, cast away the yoke of the Russian monarchy which was oppressing Byelorussia most of all. Without consulting the people, the czar had involved our country in the tragedy of war, which razed to the ground Byelorussian towns and villages. Now we, the Rada of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic, are liberating our country from the last vestige of state dependency imposed by the Russian monarchy upon our free and independent country.

From now on, the Byelorussian Democratic Republic is proclaimed a free and independent state. The people of Byelorussia through their elected Constituent Assembly shall themselves determine the future relations of Byelorussia with other states.

This present act nullifies all previous state relationships which gave a foreign government the power to sign the treaty in Brest also on behalf of Byelorussia; the treaty that spells death for the Byelorussian people and cuts their country into pieces. On the basis of this present act the Government of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic shall approach the interested parties and propose the revision of that part of the Brest treaty which concerns Byelorussia and the conclusion of the peace treaty with all belligerent States.

The Byelorussian Democratic Republic shall embrace the whole territory inhabited by the Byelorussian people as a majority and namely it should include the governorship of Mienisk, Vilnia, Horadzien, Viciebsk, Smalensk, Cernihau and adjacent parts of districts inhabited by Byelorussians.

The Rada of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic confirms all those rights and Civic liberties which were granted by the act of March 9th, 1918. Proclaiming the independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic, its Rada hopes that all freedom-loving nations will render assistance to the Byelorussian people in their endeavor to secure full realization of their political ideals of statehood.

March 25, 1918, in Mienisk.

RADA OF THE BYELORUSSIAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the proclamation of independence, I would like to have incorporated as part of my remarks an essay prepared by the Byelorussian Congress Committee of America on the historical development of the Byelorussian nation. The essay follows:

ESSAY ON BYELORUSSIA

March 25, 1970, marks an anniversary of great significance for American citizens of Byelorussian origin, for on that day Byelorussians everywhere in the countries of the free world will celebrate the 52nd anniversary of the proclamation of independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. In Byelorussia, however, a national celebration of independence is replaced by the observance of 100th anniversary of the birth of Vladimir Ulianoff (Lenin), former leader of the Russian Bolshevik Party and former head of Soviet Russian Government, glorified as the alleged benefactor of the Byelorussian people.

The United Nations' Commission on Human Rights on March 13, 1969 has adopted a resolution to commemorate the 100th year since the birth of Vladimir Ulianoff (Lenin), former leader of the Russian Bolshevik Party and former head of Soviet Russian Government, as a great humanitarian. This celebration will take place on April 20, 1970.

Byelorussian people is enslaved by Soviet Russia today and is unable to express freely its past and present experiences under communism and its opinion on the humanitarianism of Lenin. Therefore, we would like to present an opinion on the humanitarianism of Lenin with respect to the Byelorussian people and its country.

As a theorist of Russian Bolshevism, Lenin appeared as a decisive defender of the integrity of the Russian Empire, many years before usurping power in Russia. In his program for the Russian Social-Democratic Workers' Party (Bolsheviks), Lenin acknowledged the right of non-Russian nations for selfdetermination down to separation from Russia. However, he was granting only the right of separation, but not real separation. Lenin was against separation of non-Russian nations from Russia. His position was for holding them inside the borders of the Russian state and to convince his own party members to take the same attitude (Letter, by Lenin, from Krakau to S. Shaumian, November 23, 1913).

After usurpation of power in Russia on November 7, 1917 Lenin showed utmost hostility toward the liberation of all non-Russian nations, dominated by the Russian Empire. The Declaration of Rights for nations of Russia, accepted by the Bolshevik Government, was a repetition of the national policy as it was formulated previously in the program of the Bolshevik Party by Lenin.

The treatment of Byelorussia, headed by the Lenin government—was as follows. The First All-Byelorussian Congress consisting of 1,872 representatives convened in Mienisk on December 15, 1917. This was a national Byelorussian assembly, whose aim was to decide the future statehood of Byelorussia. Bolshevik-Russian delegates were in a small minority. They were not able to influence the Congressional decisions. The Congress has chosen independence for the Byelorussian state. On December 17, 1917 the Red Russian Army dispersed the Congress by order of the Soviet Russian Government.

During the continuing war, at a favorable situation, the Council of the First All-Byelorussian Congress proclaimed independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic on March 25, 1918. In opposition to this independent Byelorussian state Lenin ordered the creation of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic (BSSR). This fictitious state, as well as its government, were created by the Soviet Government in Moscow, Proclamation of the BSSR took place on January 1, 1919 in the city of Smalensk which was conquered by Russia.

Later, the Soviet Russian Army conquered most of Byelorussia. Concluding peace treaty with Poland in Riga in 1921, Lenin without representatives from the BSSR divided the territory of Byelorussia as follows: The BSSR was alloted a territory of six counties of the Miensk district only, with a population of approximately 1.2 million. Poland was given approximately 100,000 sq. km. of Byelorussia with a population of approximately 4 million. Directly to Russian SFSR there was annexed approximately 250,000 sq. km. of Byelorussian territory with a population of over 9 million. This partition of Byelorussia and subjugation of her people existed until the death of Lenin. In this way Lenin brutally suppressed the aims of the Byelorussian people for self-determination and independence, and turned into a colonial people of Soviet Russia.

By introduction of his own totalitarian communist regime in Byelorussia, Lenin deprived Byelorussian people of all its human rights and freedoms, the rights recognized by the Western World at this time, and proclaimed earlier by the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. Those rights being: freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of press, freedom of association, freedom of worship, freedom of economical activity, freedom to elect one's own government, freedom to choose one's habitat and travel abroad, immunity of home, independence of judiciary, etc. Freedom of activity was given to the Bolshevik Party only, which was executing orders from the central government in Moscow. The leadership of this party in Byelorussia was composed of non-Byelorussians. It was a reliable instrument for domination over the Byelorussian nation.

The constitution of the BSSR, as well as the USSR, guaranteed in writing most of the above mentioned freedoms. However, these constitutions exist on paper only to mislead the foreign opinion. In reality the Bolshevik Party is using such policies which are suiting her aims, ignoring completely existing constitutions.

Lenin introduced a very brutal tyranny by governing Bolshevik Party superiors. Called by him, hypocritically, "workers' and peasants' government", as well as a Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party, included neither a single worker, not a peasant. The Communist Party occupied a privileged place, that which was previously held by nobility in czarist era.

The Bolshevik Party represented a new ruling class of fascist type. It used a limitless and merciless exploitation of working people. Starvation and hunger, shortage of all necessary articles existed in reality during Lenin's rule. Only the members of the Communist Party were supplied through special exclusive distribution stores, unaccessible to the rest of the population.

This oppression of people was possible only by the use of mass and ruthless terror. In this field Lenin showed extraordinary ability. He organized Cheka (Extarordinary Committee—Secret Police) headed by the notorious F. Derzhynsky. This mill of death had no other predecessor in modern history. The infamous czarist security service (okhranka) in comparison with Cheka was a very liberal institution. The surveillance by police was raised to systematic denunciation of each person. The Cheka kept an accumulative personal file on all. A new crime was discovered in which each person became a suspect—the potential enemy of the Soviet Government. The arrests of innocent people in mass as those potential enemies; the relentless savage abuse and torture of imprisoned people, who were admitting the non-committed crimes; the shooting of people en mass without trial—all this, as a sword of Damocles, was hanging over a defenseless people, murdered by Lenin's bureaucrats, immune to any responsibility.

Lenin is the father of Russian Bolshevism, that which is oppressing Byelorussian people for over 50 years. This period is the most severe and tragic of all Byelorussian history. During this time the Bolshevik Moscow annihilated over 6 million Byelorussians. But, at the present time, using systematic Russianization, deportations of Byelorussians to Siberia, and colonization of Byelorussia by Russians, the Moscow Government is attempting a complete removal from the globe of the separate Byelorussian nation and transforming it into a part of Russia. This genocide is a direct result of the Leninist national policies applied towards non-Russian nations of the USSR.

Miss Svetlana Alliluyeva, daughter of J. Stalin, recently made this public statement, ". . . all of this did not begin with my father. So many people think that he invented the system, the dictatorship, the police, the spying. But he didn't. He inherited it all from Lenin."

Lenin projected conquest of the entire globe by Bolshevism. He designed a universal USSR, of course, under the hegemony of Soviet Russia. This design is used by the present government of Moscow as a current program of realization. Soviet Russia is giving top priority to the development of her own military power, and is gradually realizing the testament of Lenin on the conquest and enslavement of the remaining independent countries. This subjugation of nations of central Europe after the 2nd World War, communist expansion in Greece, Korea and Vietnam, the recent military invasion into Czechoslovakia, all these are the concurrent steps leading towards the realization of the expansionist plan designed by Lenin.

We are assuming, that proposal to commemorate the birthday of Lenin in the United Nations was initiated by the representatives from Soviet Russia, or by their subservient countries-satellites. The real aim behind this diversionist maneuver is to disorient nations of the free world, and to make them more vulnerable to gradual absorption by Moscow.

We would like to call your kind attention to the fact that this commemoration would be a most cynical humiliation of the idea of humanism. It would be a public mockery of human rights as defined by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations. It will demonstrate a flagrant injustice expressed by the free countries towards the Byelorussian nation, which was conquered, oppressed and suffered heavily under Lenin's terrorist rule, as well as under the rule, inspired by him, of the present Government of Soviet Russia. We would like to ask you for decisive rejection of this celebration as completely inappropriate for people honoring freedom and justice for all.

At this time, the Byelorussians living in their native country do not have any opportunity to defend their national interests. Therefore, we take liberty to ask you for support of the desires of the Byelorussian people for liberation from Soviet Russian slavery, and for restoration of an independent Byelorussian state.

JUDGE RICHARD E. FIELDS ELEVATED

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, the elevation of Associate Judge Richard E. Fields to the judge of the municipal court of Charleston was a very popular decision by the County Council of Charleston.

Judge Fields is the first Negro in the memory of modern Charlestonians to serve as municipal judge—or to hold any judgeship.

Judge Fields has distinguished himself by training, by demeanor, by temperament, and professional legal ability to hold the positions which he has held and which he will hold.

I am very proud that he succeeds my friend, Judge Condon, who, likewise, has distinguished himself as municipal judge.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert herewith an editorial from today's News and Courier, America's most outspoken newspaper and the South's oldest daily paper entitled, "Municipal Court":

MUNICIPAL COURT

Elevation of Associate Judge Richard E. Fields to be judge of the Municipal Court of Charleston is a logical and popular decision by unanimous vote of City Council. Judge Fields again makes local history by becoming the first Negro to hold this title. Since we applauded his appointment as associate judge we are pleased to join again in applause at the promotion.

Judge Fields had an outstanding reputation as a lawyer when he accepted the judicial appointment. In his handling of cases he has lived up to expectations. Appointment of Thomas S. Tisdale Jr., an able young attorney, to fill the vacancy created by resignation of Judge Louis E. Condon will fill the quota of judges in an important function of local government.

CAPT. ROBERT W. WILBUR, JR., RECEIVES FAA AWARD

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join Secretary of Transportation John Volpe in praising the heroic performance of Eastern Air Lines captain, Robert W. Wilbur, Jr. Captain Wilbur was awarded the Federal Aviation Administration's highest award, the Award for Extraordinary Service, at a presentation at Massachusetts General Hospital.

Captain Wilbur was shot in both arms by John J. Divivo, a passenger who burst into the cockpit of a jet shuttle flight from New York to Boston. Wilbur's copilot, First Officer James Hartley, was mortally wounded as he struggled to disarm the gunman. Captain Wilbur brought the DC–9 Jetliner down safely, in spite of his wounds.

Captain Wilbur was commended by the U.S. Senate for his "extraordinary heroism," and the official citation praised his "masterful feat of airmanship which revealed extraordinary heroism, faultless skill, and courageous equanimity. His poise and professionalism under conditions of maximum adversity warrant the admiration and gratitude not only of the 70 others aboard his aircraft but of the entire aviation community and American public at large."

I agree—and agree wholly.

Secretary Volpe said yesterday:

Captain Wilbur's actions were extraordinary. Wounded, his friend dying beside him, their assailant lying wounded on the floor behind him, Captain Wilbur cooly went through the landing procedures—even to lighting the "No Smoking" and "Seat Belt" Signs, an action which helped calm the passengers—and brought the plane in perfectly.

One of only eight men who have earned the FAA's highest award, Captain Wilbur has amply demonstrated the kind of courage and professionalism the Award for Extraordinary Service demands.

ENCOURAGING ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

HON. JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the majority of American citizens recognize the need to end poverty in the United States. Unfortunately, this is not the case in regard to the need to encourage peaceful economic and social change in the rest of the world. All to many Americans believe that we can ignore the increasing gap between the rich nations and the poor nations.

But we ignore this gap at our own peril Mr. Speaker. Events in areas far removed from our own country can have a profound impact on us here at home. Revolutions, civil wars, wars of national liberation, all feed on the discontent caused by the abject poverty of much of the world's population. Fortunately, groups like the Friends Committee on National Legislation whose policy report on international development included below are aware of the need to build a stable world community in which the distribution of wealth more closely approximates that of equals than of clients and masters.

The policy statement of the Friends Committee on National Legislation follows:

ENCOURAGING INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT: CHALLENGE TO THE CONSCIENCE AND COMMONSENSE OF AMERICA

(A policy statement of the Friends Committee on National Legislation approved at the annual meeting, Washington, D.C., January 18, 1970)

NEW VISION NEEDED

The United Nations has declared the 1970's as the Second Decade of Development in which much greater progress must be made. FCNL educational and legislative goals on international development and trade should incorporate new thinking to answer questions like these:

1. How can the American people and Congress become convinced that there must be a major, new undertaking to assist developing nations in their struggle against poverty, ignorance, hunger and disease—because this is a moral imperative, because it is in the long-range national interest and because it is essential in building a peaceful world?

2. How can the United States both end poverty at home and do its fair share in enabling developing nations to raise living standards? If the United States cannot end poverty at home, does it have much to offer the world?

3. How can developing nations change their existing institutions and attitudes rapidly enough, through non-violent means, to meet people's rising expectations for a better life, dignity and justice?

4. How can mankind develop satisfying ways of living without exhausting the world's resources and ruining the human environment? Is industrialization a means to that end?

5. How can all countries develop public attitudes and social incentives necessary to stabilize world population?

We believe that new vision is necessary in order that mankind may grasp the unprecedented opportunities to become an interdependent, cooperative family. The United States has a moral imperative to share our great wealth and help build a comprehensive world community of all peoples. Even strict, enlightened self-interest requires the United States to provide its share of leadership in this direction. This demands commitment by the people and Congress of the United States to an international trading system which encourages peaceful economic and social development and to an annual investment of at least 2% of American Gross National Product in assistance to the developing nations.

Such commitment must be based on a concept of a world unified in its will and capability to eliminate hunger, illiteracy, and disease and stabilize over-population, but rich in diverse cultural values Such a vision can be realized by reordering priorities replacing the pursuit of the arms race with the pursuit of an enhancement of human dignity. Such a world can be achieved through a strengthening of the institutions of cooperation among nations.

We believe the United States has the economic capacity both to meet our current huge domestic needs and also to play a responsible role in international development. Utilizing even a part of the funds now going for arms would provide a huge reservoir for development. If this proves inadequate we would be prepared to support a reduction in American affluence to achieve these goals.

One challenge of the 1970's is to achieve a cooperative working relationship among the Communist and non-Communist developed nations which will promote rather than retard the process of international development. Another challenge is to encourage a broadening of popular participation in the political life and economic benefits of all nations.

The price of success is small. Increasing the purchasing power of developing nations by lowering trade barriers, easing debt burdens, and stabilizing commodity prices will force painful readjustments on some sectors of the American economy but will in the long run increase U.S. prosperity. The investment of at least 1% of GNP by our government and up to 1% by private industry and by non-governmental agencies will be a small sacrifice in relation to the 9% of GNP now being devoted to military expenditures. However, it will mean a tripling of assistance funds over the present outlay.

The price of failure is frightening. The majority of the world's citizens face desperation as the gap between the rich and the poor nations widens each year. In the greatest migration the world has ever known, cities are doubling their population every ten years, largely through the growth of slums where unemployment, social disorganization and despair are rife. There is an inexcusable waste of human skills and energy and an increased danger of conflict. The nationalism which can create the will to development may, under these conditions, be turned to international tension and war.

We believe that new forces are at work which have potential to achieve this vision and thereby provide a heritage of hope for future generations. These forces are:

TECHNOLOGY

Technology provides many material blessings for man. It can improve significantly his standard of living and the quality of life through more and better food, clothing and housing, through family limitation, desalination of sea water, better communication, transportation, urban development and many other ways. But the rapidly spreading technological culture currently consumes irreplaceable natural resources at an accelerating pace, spreads pollution into our air, rivers and oceans, and exacts a vast human cost. The rapid urbanization of the world poses as yet unsolved problems of mass living in societies where machines and systems increasingly take priority over people. These are the subjects to which the world's scientists and technicians should now be devoting themselves, rather than to military research and development.

YOUTH

Most of the people in the developing world are less than 20 years old. The development of their full human potential is a first priority for the world. The young, not committed to many of the outmoded institutions and politics of the past, often find themselves in conflict with the "establishment." Fortunately, their loyalties often surmount narrow national racial or class boundaries. Many are devoting their full energies to the task of development in their own countries. But to be successful they will need more prophetic vision, imagination and balanced judgment than has been applied to international relations in the past.

DISSATISFACTION

The much discussed "revolution of rising expectations" is being followed by demands for political and economic revolution. Existing institutions in many countries are unable to keep pace with the demand for rapid change which has been created. In many cases, ruling groups represent a narrow segment of the whole population and block proposals for reform. Increasingly there are military governments. Struggles for power in many of these countries can involve major powers on opposite sides of internal disputes, thus diverting national energies from development and increasing conflict among the major powers.

INWARD-TURNING

We sense a world-wide trend to focus national energies on internal problems. On the whole, we believe this is healthy. In the developing countries rapid economic and social development requires hard work, sacrifice and the concentrated energies of the whole nation. There is no easy road to development, although the rate of growth can be stimulated by outside capital and technical assistance. To the extent that nationalism creates a sense of identity, cooperation and a framework for education and effective organization, it is crucial to development. But nationalism should not be diverted to focus on external or internal "enemies" or succumb to the temptation to seek scapegoats when frustrations arise. There must simultaneously be recognition of the fundamental fact of interdependence and awareness of the need for regional and international cooperation. This requires greater limitation on nation-states as such in favor of the common good.

DEVELOPING AS A LEARNING PROCESS

Only in recent years has man consciously attempted through a planned and coordinated effort to achieve rapid economic and social development. There have been many successful projects and in some cases, targets have been met beyond expectations. An analysis of the Pearson Commission report for the World Bank indicates:

Despite burgeoning population growth, incomes per head in developing nations grew at 2.0 to 2.5 percent per year. This per capita income growth compares favorably with the early experience of industrialized countries.

Industrial growth in low income countries in the 1960's has been more rapid than that in the industrialized countries.

New high-yield wheat and rice seeds and methods are bringing an agricultural revolution to the developing countries.

But experience has also been a hard master. There has been waste; there have been mistakes. In our own nation there is still no clarity as to the best methods to end poverty and raise living standards for all people in the nation. The international problem is even more complex. There are infinitely complicated questions of motivation, priorities, financing, trade standards and administration. Development goals have often been confused with military and political aims to the detriment of sound progress.

Nevertheless, lessons have been learned and experience gained which will be invaluable in the years ahead. We urge a recognition that our knowledge and understanding of the process and requirements for development are improving steadily, providing assurance that future assistance can be more effectively used than in the past.

While we agree more study is needed on the complexities of the process of modernization and how to bring it about most effectively for the benefit of all, we have some unity and clarity on a number of points:

1. Priorities

In allocating scarce resources for development many factors must be considered. We believe several should receive priority:

Need, as indicated by current living standards and number of people affected;

Reasonable assurance that assistance will improve the lot of the lower and middle classes within the country;

Sound development plans which help assure assistance will be effectively and efficiently used and population stabilized.

In many developing nations a small political, military or economic elite enjoys most of the fruits of the system and has reaped the benefits of much of the "foreign aid" which the country has received. These elites are often supported by U.S. military policy and by U.S. business interests. In these nations there must be basic reforms, often including tax reform and land redistribution, if all citizens are to benefit. Development assistance in these cases should aid in the process of reform wherever possible. If programs can be designed to improve the lot of the common people directly through health, education and community assistance programs, and relief, these should be emphasized. Above all, such regimes should not be encouraged by military assistance.

We urge that all U.S. foreign military assistance, defense support and arms sales for credit or cash be ended now.

The United States must base its support of developing nations upon how effectively the Government is meeting the real needs of its disadvantaged people; not on some ideological litmus test such as the form of its government or its economic system.

2. Sharing of skills

The fulfillment of human potential is the keystone to development. We favor a broad increase in the sharing of knowledge and skills with the developing countries especially through voluntary agencies and multilateral technical assistance. We support the initiatives at the UN for establishing an international service corps. We feel that better training facilities and greater professional opportunities within the developing nations can stem the outflow of skilled persons to the industrial states. And better integration of technical assistance into the entire developmental process will increase the effective use of available capital. These and all development programs should be undertaken on the basis of long term commitments extending over a number of years. This permits more orderly and effective use of resources and of skills of competent people who are committing a large portion of their lives to international development.

3. Social development

Economic development and modernization often result in personal insecurity and breakdown of traditional family and community life. We have a special concern that broad community planning and development proceed apace with economic development in order to maximize human values and minimize the human cost of the development process. We urge increased attention to this factor. The best values of the older culture should be retained where possible and new programs adopted where necessary to help build a spirit of community, cooperation and dignity.

4. Adequate capital

Development requires a much larger transfer of capital to the developing countries than is now occurring. We advocate:

That the developed countries devote up to 2% of their gross national product for international development purposes, including at least 1% from official development sources as distinguished from private investment and credits. More transfers should be on a grant or low-interest, long-term-payment basis, in convertible currencies without tying assistance to purchases or pledges of sales of raw materials in the donor country; and

That new sources be found to obtain this additional capital: (a) from the new wealth created annually in the developed countries through increase in the gross national product, as, for example, assignment of a portion of the Special Drawing Rights of the International Monetary Fund to the developing nations; (b) from income resulting from exploitation of generally accepted international areas, such as the high seas and Antarctica; and (b) by immediate reallocation for economic development of the interest and principal on previous development loans as payments are made.

5. International trade and investment

While economic assistance can be a catalyst, nations achieve development primarily through the use of domestic savings and foreign exchange earnings. Increased international and interregional trade, therefore, is essential to sustain long-term development and sound relationships among the nations in our increasingly interdependent world. It is crucial also in the short run to complement development assistance, create jobs and generate foreign exchange. The developed countries must reduce their trade barriers and open channels of trade for products of the developing nations, along the lines recommended by the 77 "have-not" nations at the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development. International price stabilization for basic commodities is imperative.

Skills, technology and capital are also transferred to developing nations to a substantial degree through the activities of international business corporations. Some of these enterprises have been charged with "economic imperialism" and resistance to land tax and other reforms. One way to help avoid such abuses would be to develop and achieve acceptance of an international code of corporate practices, which an appropriate UN agency or the World Bank might take the lead in formulating. The U.S. government should discourage those practices by U.S. corporations abroad which are exploitative in nature. and should encourage fair wages and a fair return to the people of the country involved through taxation, coownership and expansion of indigenous control.

6. Population

Predictions of future population growth are astounding. All public and private efforts to institute sound programs of family planning and population control should be supported. But it should be recognized that there is often only a limited role that "outsiders" can play without generating adverse reactions. As a part of our individual responsibility to stop population growth, we should limit the size of our own families to two children, adopting others if a larger family is desired.

7. Food

The green revolution resulting from new seeds, fertilizers, irrigation, production and organization methods fortunately has created a major breakthrough in food production in many countries. However, there is little prospect of feeding the world until population growth is stopped. Attention must continue to be focused on nutrition in order to insure that growing children, especially, are not damaged by malnutrition. Care must be taken that intensive farming operations do not harm the nutritional quality of the food produced, nor the soil, water or related environment.

Moreover, the U.S. must recognize that the developing countries must also have markets for their agricultural products, therefore the U.S. should not adopt policies which unfairly subsidize sales of U.S. farm products abroad.

8. Channels

The need for assistance is so great that all possible channels must be used—multinational, bilateral, public and private. Each can play an important role in individual situations. We see special advantages in using international channels which strengthen international institutions, reinforce the concept of international cooperation, and are able to draw upon resources and personnel from a wider range than bilateral or national programs. Hence we strongly support the work of the "family" of UN development programs such as the United Nations Development Programme, the Specialized Agencies, the World Bank and its affiliated International Development Association and regional economic commissions. We also support regional organizations for development such as regional banks, common markets and consortia, as well as regional development projects such as those for the Mekong River and the Indus Basin.

Programs by private groups—churches, foundations, universities, cooperatives, and others—supplement large governmental programs and can often play a pioneering and experimental role. They also evidence solid public support for the concept of international development. We commend especially efforts such as the Quaker "One Percent More Fund" which ask contributors to share 1% of their income for international development.

Bilateral programs still provide the bulk of funds for international development. In the past these programs have been viewed with considerable skepticism. Some have seemed designed basically for the military, political or narrow economic advantage of the donor nation. Others have benefitted a narrow sector in the recipient country.

We urge that U.S. bilateral development assistance concentrate on projects which have the support of competent international planning agencies, and which are designed to be of direct benefit to large masses of people, as in those authorized by Title IX of current aid legislation.

Overall, there should be greater international coordination of aid, trade and investment policies. A United Nations sponsored group should make an inventory of world need, recommend priority programs, help coordinate the various international, bilateral and private efforts, and evaulate the quality of performance.

9. Environment

As modernization occurs in the developing nations, they too will be required to deal with some of its byproducts such as pollution, waste of resources and dislocation of balances between man and nature. This raises fundamental questions regarding the nature and extent of desirable economic development. In this context the 1972 UN Conference on the Human Environment becomes especially significant. As a leading technologically oriented nation, the U.S. should take the initiative in formulating new and imaginative proposals for this Conference.

SMOKING CONTROVERSY

HON. TIM LEE CARTER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 18, 1970

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, those of us who attended last year's lengthy hearings on this bill were amazed to find, from the scores of scientific experts who appeared before us, that virtually no significant progress has been made in research to resolve the smoking controversy since the Congress last acted on this matter 5 years ago.

Last month, just as the conferees were about to meet on this bill, the American Cancer Society held a news conference to announce results of certain smoking experiments involving beagle dogs, in which some manifestations of lung cancer were said to have been observed. One witness before our committee had been Dr. Victor Buhler, one of America's most distinguished pathologists and a former president of the College of American Pathologists. Recalling his testimony regarding animal smoke inhalation studies, I wrote to Dr. Buhler and asked him to comment on this latest report. His reply strikes me as a perfect illustration of the difficulty of deriving real meaning from research results which are publicly reported, with great fanfare, before there has been any opportunity for critical scrutiny by qualified scientists.

Dr. Buhler's letter speaks for itself, and, without objection, I would like to share it with our colleagues, as follows:

ST. JOSEPH HOSPITAL,
Kansas City, Mo., February 21, 1970.

Hon. TIM LEE CARTER,
House of Representatives, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. CARTER: Thank you for your recent telegram in which you inquired about an animal smoke inhalation experiment announced by Drs. Auerbach and Hammond earlier this month.

In connection with my testimony before your Committee last April (which, of course, was long before Drs. Auerbach and Hammond announced their results), I stated that in some inhalation experiments "there has been considerable trauma to the respiratory system of the animal by the procedures used." I went on to say that if lung cancer were produced by this experimental method, "I would have to question the effect which the trauma itself might have had in the result."

The method used by Dr. Auerbach is just such an experiment to which I made reference. He used dogs (beagles) who "smoked" in an unnatural way by means of a surgical incision in the neck tissues and trachea which was permanently kept patent by use of a foreign body (a hollow tube). This is certainly much different than the way in which a human being smokes a cigarette.

As you know, a scientist usually informs his colleagues and shares the knowledge of his experimental work by publishing the results of his experiment in a reputable scientific journal. The results of the latest Auerbach experiment have not been so published. My first knowledge of these experiments came from a front page article in our local newspaper.

Immediately after the newspaper article appeared, I obtained a copy of the report which was the basis for the newspaper publicity. I have read this report several times and carefully reviewed its contents. In responding to your request for my comments, I am compelled to say that the report raises several important questions. For example:

1. Experimental results offered as scientific evidence are only as good as, and can be no better than, the experimental model used. With this in mind, how can anyone claim that this experiment approximates the natural method of smoking in humans? The method used by Dr. Auerbach involves the direct delivery of cigarette smoke to the lower trachea, the bronchi and the lungs, thereby bypassing the oral cavity, the pharynx, the larynx and the upper portion of the trachea. A tracheotomy is a most unnatural way for an animal to breathe and certainly introduces the possibility of infection, both bacterial and viral, not only from the tracheotomy, but also by the constant irritation of the hollow tube used to keep the tracheotomy patent. I should think that such a technique would arouse extreme skepticism. Not only were all of the protective mechanisms of the upper respiratory tract not allowed to function, but also the mixing of air and smoke which occurs under normal smoking conditions could not have occurred. In earlier beagle dog experiments, Dr. Auerbach reported that five successive inhalations of smoke were taken in by the dog without intervening inhalation of air. The dog's mouth and nostrils would presumably have to be closed by physical force so as to allow for inhalation through the hollow tube in the throat. These indisputably traumatic conditions could in themselves be causative and therefore create extreme doubt as to the meaning of the reported results.

2. It may well be that the dog is not a suitable animal for lung experimentation. For example, McLaughlin, Tyler and Canada have warned experimenters in their article entitled "A Study of the Subgross Pulmonary Anatomy in Various Mammals", American Journal of Anatomy 108(2): 149–165 (1961), that ". . . great caution should be exercised in the choice of an experimental animal for pulmonary studies if they are to be applied to man. This is especially so if the dog, cat, or monkey are to be used, in view of their marked anatomical differences from man."

3. Why were there only eight control dogs out of a total original population of ninety-seven dogs? Were the control dogs subjected to simulated smoking and otherwise treated in every way as were the other dogs? It does not appear that a properly controlled air stream directed through the tracheostoma was substituted for "smoke" and unless this was done I am inclined to question whether these eight dogs could be deemed adequate controls.

4. It is not at all clear what Dr. Auerbach means by the word "early" in his reference to "early squamous cell bronchial carcinomas." This is not standard terminology so I do not know whether he has reference to "carcinoma-in-situ" or to some other lesion. Since Dr. Auerbach's results have not been published, including adequate photographs, and since the criteria utilized are not clear, one should exercise great caution in drawing any conclusions at this time from the descriptive phraseology used.

5. Most of the "invasive tumors" reported in the dogs that "smoked" were described as being of a bronochioloalveolar type. This is the type of cancer which is infrequent in human beings. Even the Public Health Service has not associated this type of tumor with cigarette smoking. Does Dr. Auerbach refute his previous reports of a relationship of squamous cell carcinoma and smoking in humans by now claiming that the bronchioloalveolar type is more prevalent? [I should add that I cannot determine from the report how many "invasive tumors" in all were tumors deemed malignant, whether bronchiolo-aleveolar or squamous, had metastasized.]

6. Dr. Auerbach has reported tumors in over sixty percent of the "smoking" dogs in the groups sacrificed. Based on my knowledge and experience, there is no such incidence, similar to these statistics, in any human population.

7. Similarly, an amazing twenty-five percent of the non-smoking dogs were reported to have developed tumors. What might the percentage have been if the dogs had been allowed to live out their entire lives? Serious questions are raised by this reported finding with respect to the use, not just of dogs generally, but of the beagles in this particular experiment. Was any real control of genetic, viral, environmental and other factors imposed?

Medical "breakthroughs", usually announced in newspaper headlines, often turn out to be disappointments when subjected to careful scientific scrutiny. For example, a December 1967 article by Harris and Negroni reported the production of lung tumors in cigarette smoking mice. It was hailed by an American Cancer Society sponsored bulletin, widely distributed to dentists and physicians, as undermining "one of the long-standing defenses of the tobacco industry." The headline on the story read "Lung Cancer: Another Experimental 'First'." But in the published article, the authors cautioned that "the mouse lung cannot be equated histologically with the human lung, and so 'degrees of carcinogenicity' derived in one system may have no validity for the other." Even HEW's 1968 Supplement to The Health Consequences of Smoking summed up this "scientific breakthrough" as follows: "Harris and Negroni, in experiments with C–57 black mice, some of which were inoculated with viruses, achieved some enhancement of adenocarcinoma, but did not produce any proven squamous cell cancers."

It must be remembered that scientists have failed to induce human type lung cancer in animal experiments for nearly thirty years by having the animals inhale cigarette smoke. In view of these findings, the unpublished report by Dr. Auerback must be viewed with considerable restraint. I sincerely hope that his reporting of "early squamous cell bronchial carcinoma" in only two dogs will not be viewed by your Committee as scientific proof as to whether or not cigarette smoking has been established as the cause of lung cancer in humans.

Respectfully,

VICTOR B. BUHLER, M.D.,
Pathologist.

SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, the national interest of the United States dictates that we do everything within our power to preserve peace in the Middle East.

Peace in the Middle East is only possible if the Israelis and Arabs sit down and negotiate a peace treaty. History does not record any peace settlement achieved without a joint effort of the contending parties to settle all outstanding claims around the conference table.

It is in this context we must review the recent refusal by President Nixon to provide warplanes for Israel.

This action by the President will not help toward peace, it will hinder it. The Israelis are ready to go to a peace conference tomorrow. It is the Arabs who refuse to negotiate—even to talk. They will continue to refuse to talk as long as they have hope that they can destroy the State of Israel.

Any suggestion that Israel cannot obtain the necessary strength to defend herself only encourages Arab intransigence, perpetuates the present dangerous situation and prevents the achievement of a meaningful peace.

Because of the overwhelming preponderance of Arab manpower, Israel needs desperately control of the air. To maintain that control, a reasonably predictable supply of aircraft and parts is indispensable.

With the commitment of 100 French Mystere jets to Libya by the French Government, it is obvious that Israel faces a major challenge within the near future.

The Nixon policy seems to be one of brinkmanship, a painful reminder of the John Foster Dulles failures of the past.

I urge the President to rethink this policy now and to assure Israel the support necessary for its self-defense and survival.

AGAINST ALL ENEMIES

HON. LOUIS C. WYMAN

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. WYMAN. In the March 1970 issue of the U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings appears an article authored by Capt. Robert J. Hanks, U.S. Navy, that deserves the attention of each Member of this and the other body. This article is apparently the Institute's "prize essay for 1970" and is a lucid and penetrating piece which offers real insight into the problems confronting our dedicated but very much maligned members of our Armed Forces by a segment of today's society that should know better.

The essay entitled "Against All Enemies" follows:

AGAINST ALL ENEMIES

(By Capt. Robert J. Hanks, U.S. Navy)

"For it's Tommy this an' Tommy that, an' 'Chuck him out, the brute!'
But it's 'Savior of 'is country' when the guns begin to shoot;"

When Rudyard Kipling penned these words nearly 80 years ago, he described the British regular soldier as he was traditionally viewed by his countrymen. Though the United States of 1970 bears no resemblance to Kipling's Victorian England, the words could nonetheless be applied today to America's fighting men. In fact, some phrases now being tossed about are much more vitriolic than the second line of the above stanza.

Those who currently wear the uniform of the nation's armed forces are being branded as everything from idiots to conspirators. Military men—together with a large group of "conniving industrialists"—are charged with having formed an insidious coalition designed solely to extract unending self-enrichment from the labors of the American people. This conspiratorial concept holds that the military man's payoff comprises large amounts of money and liquor, the favors of co-operative women, and promises of lucrative jobs following retirement. Moreover, his basic perfidy is compounded by a narrow-minded and potentially disastrous willingness to destroy all life on earth if Communism—man's ultimate enemy in his benighted view—seems to be a serious threat. And finally, along with the vast army of bellicose veterans he has trained and indoctrinated in the past quarter of a century, he has transformed the United States into a militaristic and predatory nation which now preys upon the rest of the world.

Examined from any angle, this is a shocking picture. And it poses a rash of questions: Who levels such charges? Are the accusations true? How dangerous are they? Most important of all: What should be done about the assault?

To begin with, it must be understood that this is no academic exercise, for upon the answers to these questions most assuredly rests the future security of the United States. The charges cannot, therefore, be brushed aside and ignored on the assumption that, like previous anti-military campaigns in America, they will fade away before any grave damage is done. This is especially true if today's critics are more numerous or, above all, more influential than the usual lunatic fringe—those who will senselessly attack any available target at any given opportunity.

A survey of these critics—both actual members of the anti-military clique, and those whose utterances the cabal exploits—reveals that we are confronted with a highly articulate and extremely influential body. It therefore behooves us to listen most carefully to and examine as objectively as possible the charges that are being made.

The following spokesmen formulate probably the most effective pronouncements currently trumpeted by the anti-militarists. It should not be inferred, however, that the former individuals are labeled herein either as leaders or members of the anti-military movement. Nor are they being classified anti-military per se. But because their words serve as eminent fuel for use by those who tend the anti-military fires, the views of these critics are vitally important. Lastly, one must note that their views will be scrutinized quite without regard to any particular order of motivation, influence, believability or sincerity.

At the outset it might be wise to digress or to speculate about the atmosphere within America that has spawned and nurtured the current outcry.

It seems reasonably clear that there are two basic causes. First and foremost is the war in Vietnam. This Southeast Asian conflict is one of the least understood—and therefore most unpopular—wars in our history, primarily because the attempts of three Administrations have failed to explain to the American people in convincing terms the nature of the war and the stakes involved. This failure and America's historic impatience syndrome have combined to disillusion and discourage a large segment of the population. With disenchantment has come increasingly vocal opposition to the war—and to the military.

The second major cause is strictly domestic: an explosive drive by minority groups—ethnic and economic—for instant political power, social equality, and financial affluence. This drive directly re-enforces the anti-war fever insofar as it involves competition for the national dollar; most especially, competition for that portion of the American budget presently devoted to defense.

Taken together, these two fundamental factors have contributed heavily to growing disrespect for constituted authority, urban riots, academic chaos, moral decline, predominance of personal aspirations over national well-being and, in extreme cases, the spectre of revolution and anarchy. It is against this backdrop that one must view the phrases now being lobbed into the military camp.

Perhaps the most widely known dissenter in the United States is Senator J. William Fulbright. He has long been a critic of defense spending; in particular, of how the arms produced by that spending are used. His objections to the Bay of Pigs and Dominican Republic crises are well known. So are his 1964 expressions of astonishment over the "uncritical support" the American people annually give to military funding. Since 1965, of course, the Senator has used his position as Chairman of the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee as a springboard for an unswerving campaign against the war in Vietnam; an issue he has clung to with the tenacity of a bulldog worrying a bone.

Until recently, however, Senator Fulbright's efforts have affected the military itself only indirectly. Deeply concerned with nationalism, which he considers the most dangerous force in this century, he advocates co-operative international approaches in almost every field of endeavor. He admits that nationalism cannot be legislated out of existence and therefore insists that the United States must lead the way by moving in the direction of a broader world community, while simultaneously directing substantially more of its collective energies toward the welfare of individuals. Implicit in this program is a considerable reduction in U.S. defense spending, first of all, to provide greater welfare support and, secondly, to demonstrate by example American willingness to lay down her arms. The Senator confesses that "to bring about [such] fundamental changes in the world we would have to take certain chances." Among them would be assuming the risk—he admits this is great—that other countries would read our "generous initiatives" wrongly and "bring about a calamity."

There is another thrust to Senator Fulbright's actions. Since 1965, he has hammered away incessantly at a "Constitutional erosion" which, in his view, has at once shouldered the Senate out of the foreign policy arena and witnessed Pentagon usurpation of all State Department prerogatives in the formulation and conduct of that foreign policy. One wonders parenthetically if the Senator believes that the locus of this usurpation has now shifted from the Pentagon to Henry Kissinger's basement office in the White House. In any event, this segment of Senator Fulbright's dissent has been directed mainly at the civilian portion of the Executive Branch rather than—a few instances excepted—at the military services themselves.

In recent months, as his apparent frustration over Vietnam continued to grow, and as he increasingly turned his attention to arms control negotiations with the Soviets, Senator Fulbright expanded his target list to include direct questioning of military leaders, their beliefs and judgment. Again, using the ready-made forum of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he first trained his sights on U.S. overseas deployments, bases, and commitments. Then, in early 1969, he moved on his most spectacular target, the Safeguard Anti-Ballistic Missile System. Devoting special attention to military evaluations and recommendations, he achieved more than a little success in opening up a military credibility gap. His efforts drew loud hurrahs from hard-core anti-militarists across the country.

Nevertheless it must be emphasized that the Senator's campaign has been more implicit than explicit insofar as direct effects on the military itself are concerned. At the same time it must also be recognized that if his view of the external threat to the United States is overly sanguine, the net impact of his dissent could prove as dangerous as the fulminations of those who advocate immediate and complete unilateral disarmament of the United States.

More prolific in a literary sense and certainly more direct in his approach is another spokesman to whom the anti-military group looks for words and dogma. John Kenneth Galbraith is a long-time and most articulate liberal, a writer of some note—author of best-sellers—and former courtier of John Kennedy's Camelot. Mr. Galbraith is also an unabashed and outspoken battler against what he sees as the ultimate evil: the military-industrial complex. Perhaps the most revealing view of the beliefs held by this former chairman of the Americans for Democratic Action is provided by an article published in the June 1969 issue of Harper's Magazine: "How to Control the Military." As the title of his dissertation suggests, Mr. Galbraith claims that the military and its industrial allies have seized control of the country, placed its war chariot out in front, and are busily whipping the horses into a lather—in a headlong race to disaster. If any uninformed man has lingering doubts about the seriousness of the challenge confronting him or the capabilities of those who espouse the anti-military cause, he had better devote a few unemotional minutes to reading Galbraith's article.

Mr. Galbraith disclaims any belief in the conspiracy concept. He does so unconvincingly, however, observing almost immediately thereafter that "It would be idle to suppose that presently serving officers—those for example on assignment to defense plants—never have their real income improved by wealthy contractors with whom they are working, forswear all favors, entertain themselves, and sleep austerly alone." Then having neatly assassinated the entire officer corps, he reveals that he actually objects to the conspiracy theory, not because it is fallacious, but because it is gravely damaging to an understanding of the "military power," a commodity he forthwith defines for the benefit of the unanointed.

Comprising the "four Armed Services" [sic—with due apologies to the U.S. Marine Corps], the military industrialists, intelligence agencies, Foreign Service Officers, the Defense-oriented think-tanks, and the Congressional Armed Services Committees, "military power" makes decisions based upon its own private needs, quite without regard for the imperatives of the nation or the national good. Such is the Galbraithian view.

Unlike the unthinking anarchists and idealists who seem to predominate on dissident picket lines, however, the sage of Cambridge has a solution. After explaining how this military juggernaut came to power, he offers an Olympian "political Decalogue"—his own Ten Commandments—to guide those of his disciples who seek to regain "control of the military."

His program is a broad one. It entails the election of a new President, purge of Congressional Armed Services Committees, and above all: organization. Its goal is control of the military through resistance to military programs, mobilization of scientific judgment, and negotiation with the Soviets. Galbraith professes that his is not a crusade against the military man himself, then states that World War II military leaders would be appalled to find their modern counterparts handmaidens of the arms producers. One might note at this point that the pen—herein at its innuendo best—is indeed mightier than the sword.

Because his academic robe is figuratively festooned with professorial, ambassadorial, doctoral, and liberal service badges, Galbraith exerts considerable influence in the land, especially amidst the political left and in the realm of academe. His assertions and dictums cannot therefore be ignored. They must be exposed and rebutted.

Then there is another sort of spokesman for those who today are producing the kitchen heat which all in uniform feel. He is the military leader turned town-crier.

Certainly as far as military men are concerned, the most publicized and best known such pronouncement in recent months has been Marine General David M. Shoup's article in the April 1969 issue of The Atlantic: "The New American Militarism." Motivation for General Shoup's efforts (Colonel James A. Donovan, U.S.M.C., Ret., got precious little credit for his co-operation) is most difficult to assess. Available explanations range all the way from the General's apparent failure to become one of the "New Team" during the Kennedy years to the possibility that, having looked war square in the face, he has become a true convert to pacifism. The truth, of course, must as usual lie somewhere in between. Regardless of his motivation, though, one may be forgiven for agreeing with the National Observer's astute conclusion that he "has provided a distinct disservice."

As anyone who has read the article will agree, the General laid about his person with a king-sized club. After bowing briefly in the direction of President Dwight Eisenhower's farewell address—a statement to which many critics of the military allude, but which few quote in its entirety—the ex-Commandant of the Marine Corps brought in a plethora of indictments. Those who wear the military uniform—especially with insignia of senior rank—are enthralled with war, viewing it as a competitive game, and the highroad to promotion. They have only a narrow, military education (and, therefore, neither liberal nor cultural understanding); their primary loyalty is to their parent Service and the Department of Defense; they really do not understand Communism, either as a doctrine or a form of government; and they are more concerned with competing against aggression than with preserving the security of their own country. Moreover, they have brainwashed two generations of civilians—who initially held humanistic views—into becoming a bellicose, sword-waving second front. Unless these military officers are brought to heel, the poisonous weed they typify will surely kill the nation they have sworn to defend.

To the extent that articles such as this undermine the nation's security by destroying the credibility of those who manage the U.S. armed forces or by demanding unwarranted reductions in those forces, they are truly a "distinct disservice." Moreover, such articles are far more insidious than others because the authors appear to the layman as idealistic and high-minded insiders who, unable to change nefarious conditions from within, have undertaken full public exposure as the only remaining means of averting disaster. There seems little doubt that, in this instance, the General became an instant hero to the New Left, SDS, and others of similar persuasion. Far more importantly, he has probably sown a significant crop of doubt amongst the vast body of people. Time termed "middle Americans"—the bulk of the population, the people who dutifully pay their taxes, keep the nation running, and suffer radicals as well as their children in silence. And after all, it is this group which will ultimately decide the issue at hand.

Other voices are being raised in different ways, and they should not be overlooked. The messages vary widely.

Perhaps the most critical proposals are being made on Capitol Hill, because action taken there can force inordinate reductions in and unwise withdrawals of American military forces. For example, Senators Clifford P. Case and Walter F. Mondale—with their young staff assistants—have mounted a campaign against aircraft carriers. Senators Michael J. Mansfield and Stuart Symington were temporarily deflected from their drive to slash U.S. force levels in Europe only by the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. New York's Senator Charles E. Goodell is attempting, at the time of this writing, to legislate complete troop withdrawal from Vietnam by 1 December 1970—regardless of the consequences.

Then there are the ignorant and intemperate tirades of the racial left. Such screechings will not be dignified with comment by this examination.

In microcosm, these are the kinds of words being used today to assault the American military. During the past months charges and accusations have grown from a trickle to a flood; a torrent which could ultimately submerge the military power of the United States. And the real danger in this assault lies in a few simple truths about the world in which we live.

It is a world of power politics. In that world are nations which wish America ill—perhaps one should be blunt: nations seeking, at the very least, our political demise. It matters not whether these nations act in concert or individually. (For this reason the issue of "monolithic Communism" is specious.) So long as one or more of these nations have the military power to inflict upon or threaten the United States with grievous national harm, then our security is in jeopardy. And so long as the United States has the military prowess to prevent such harm, or to deter it through assured capability to retaliate in greater measure, that security is preserved.

Our foreign antagonists clearly understand this power equation which has governed international relations, particularly since the beginning of World War II. After that war, those nations and blocs of nations who would profit from our political passing attempted to circumvent that equation. They tried in Europe, in Korea, Cuba, and now in Vietnam, but to date they have failed. Always, America's armed strength and dedicated fighting men have blocked the way. As a result, the United States remains—as she has been for two-and-a-half decades—the Free World's main bulwark against the omnipresent tide of slavery and totalitarianism.

The outcry against all things military in the United States, if carried to its ultimate end, would upset that international power equation and destroy American as well as Free World security. Thus, while the threat from without remains, we now face an equally potent challenge from within. It makes little difference whether that challenge is generated and sustained by those who, because of myopia, fail to perceive the external dangers confronting us; by those who, through misunderstanding or wishful thinking, believe our enemies would benignly allow us to turn our backs on the world and concentrate all our efforts on our domestic ills; or by those who are enemies in the true sense of the word—idolaters of Mao and the deceased Ho—seeking a revoluntionary Communist America. Nor does it matter if—as the Long Beach Dispatch put it—"a collection of liberals, misfits and ivory-tower dreamers, aided and abetted by either naive or calculating members of the media, are out to destroy the military itself." What does matter is that the continued existence of a free and democratic United States is at issue. There is an enemy within, regardless of his appearance or the design of the mantle with which he cloaks himself.

The question that now assumes critical importance for the military is: What should be done about it? The answer is not simple. One thing is abundantly clear, however, and that is what we should not do.

If the United States is to be protected against the efforts of those who would place her in peril—whether through apathy, ignorance, or malice—we in the military cannot stand idly, silently by and watch it done. Our oath of office will not permit it.

Now is the time for everyone who wears the uniform of the American armed forces to take that oath out of the attic trunk, brush aside the dust it has collected, and read again the words upon it.

In concentrating on the main task of the past 30 years—the external threat—some of us may have forgotten that we solemnly swore to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. That pledge is not directed to a particular Service, a partisan belief, nor is it a license to hunt for personal gain. It is instead a dedication to prevent violent overthrow of a form of government Abraham Lincoln saw as the "last, best hope of earth." Our mission is clear: to ensure our country is not militarily weakened to the point that external enemies can, through the use of force, overthrow the U.S. Government and its Constitution.

No. We cannot remain either inactive or silent. Our oath of office most certainly does not condone such behavior.

But, before deciding what should be done, we must first ask ourselves another most difficult, but nonetheless vital question. How much truth is there in the accusations being hurled at the military?

In an organization as large as the U.S. armed forces, there are bound to be isolated cases of wrongdoing—cases which, when brought to light, are dealt with promptly by our uniformed services' leaders to the hilt of their political permissibility. Unfortunately, it takes only one such case to lend credibility to exaggerations and gross falsehoods that, though unrelated groundless, inevitably follow.

In an organization as large as the U.S. armed forces, there could be a very few who, as General Shoup claims, hunger for glory and are quite willing to sacrifice much to obtain it; there could be a very few who compromise principle and integrity for personal material gain; and there could be a few others who subjugate national need to individual Service pre-eminence. We in the military must redouble our efforts to guard against these isolated cases and, if and when they occur, we must continue to deal with them promptly and effectively.

Thus, if we in the armed services are to do our part in frustrating the aims of those who would turn the American eagle into a lamb, we must continue to single out and eliminate those among us who, by their avarice and indiscretion, despoil our integrity and destroy our credibility. Our regulations require it; American citizens deserve it. It is, moreover, not enough that we remain vigilant against wrongdoing itself; we must strengthen that vigilance against the exercise of poor judgment which gives the appearance of wrongdoing.

Secondly, we must police our own requirements even more rigidly if we are to disarm the critics who decry "unrestrained military spending." Specifically, we must continue our efforts to forestall justifiable criticism by attacking the problem of national military needs with hardheaded pragmatism and absolute honesty, necessarily leavened with political realism and fiscal responsibility. We cannot forget that, all too often, the vociferous critic needs only a small bit of evidence, real or apparent, to make believable a broad spectrum of accusations.

When John Kenneth Galbraith points his pen at bureaucratic institutionalism, for example, he can cite just enough evidence to make his follow-on shotgun condemnation credible; especially to the layman. When a senator uncovers one badly-written or carelessly monitored contract entailing any waste of funds, he can easily render a thousand ideal contracts suspect. When the armed services are accused of squandering public funds—be it on hardware, travel, research, or what have you—everything else we are trying to accomplish may be jeopardized.

We must continually ask ourselves, for instance, whether the American military establishment does contain some bloated staffs, worthless bases, unneeded weapons systems, or other examples of costs that cannot be supported on any rational basis—austere funding or otherwise. Insofar as the current budgetary reductions may cause us to eliminate such possible inefficiencies, they will serve us and the nation. If, on the other hand, we eliminate combat forces—the cutting edge of American military prowess—in order to hang onto a gaggle of military sacred cows, we will surely bring down on our own heads the legitimate anger of the very people we are pledged to defend. Like charity, responsibility begins at home. And, within the parameters of political reality, we must continue to be responsive to this responsibility.

We need to maintain unstinting self-vigilance because our very integrity is at issue. If, through indiscretions and sloppy practices, we permit our credibility to be shattered—it patently is chipped and cracked today—we can be sure that our sound advice and realistic requests soon will be totally ignored, even with respect to those issues which, in fact, mean life or death for the United States.

Safe in the knowledge that we are properly policing our own conduct and environment, we are free to turn our attention increasingly to those domestic critics who would, knowingly or inadvertently, gamble away U.S. national security.

And here it is pertinent to observe that while silence may be golden when fighting an aggressive external enemy, it is akin to sheer folly when combating assaults from within. In the latter instance, ammunition comprises words both spoken and written, and there is no place in such a conflict for a silent service. Moreover, the military man's historic reluctance to speak out must be overcome. Unless it is, and unless the military spokesman—buoyed by confidence in his own integrity and experience—confronts his critics directly, rather than speaking in bland, ineffectual generalities, he will make no headway at all in stemming the anti-military tide.

There is another vital requirement. As the very shrewd Galbraith noted, "There must be organization." Here we in the military are well endowed. (Certainly the SDS and others think so, judging from their efforts to subvert that organization from below.) It is an organization in being, needs only to be directed, and provides an almost infinite capacity for passing our own considered and documented view of American security needs to those most directly concerned: the vast, silent majority of the American people.

There is no other way, for instance, to counter assertions such as the one recently made by Marcus Raskin (co-director of Washington's Institute of Policy Studies) at the Conference on the Military Budget and National Priorities. He urged the abolition of the CIA, the National Security Agency, and the Defense Department within the next ten years. Only in this way, he claimed, can the "national security state" be eliminated and the continuance of a free society be assured. One can readily envisage two reactions to unchallenged irresponsibilities of this sort: chuckles of incredulity and delight in Moscow and Peking; and, in the United States, picket signs being hastily lettered by war, draft, and ROTC opponents.

Similarly, we owe it to the oath under which we serve to refute, item by item, the inaccuracies, half-truths and, in too many instances, utter nonsense which currently inundate American media.

Our approach to the problem must, of course, be a dual one. Refutation and rebuttal are essentially negative reactions. A set of positive answers is equally important; answers built around our carefully reasoned and convincingly documented conception of this nation's security needs in today's real world. Inherent in such a view is an accurate, up-to-date assessment of the external threat and what the United States needs to meet it. Those needs must be arrived at not only in the traditional way, but with the leavening provided by an objective consideration of domestic political and fiscal realities as well. Unless this latter input is included, we will fashion not just a credibility gap, but a vast chasm of distrust; one that will multiply the risks facing the United States just as surely as will many of the anti-military proposals being propounded today.

Let there be no mistake about it; the current attack upon the American military is acute—and it is growing in intensity. Joseph Kraft recently expressed the view that to succeed in "chaining the defense monster," the critics must keep shooting away. This view is widely held.

Carried to fruition, the anti-military campaign threatens to so weaken this nation's defenses as to place the United States in the greatest jeopardy in its history. After all, since we do live in a world of power politics, our ability to control our own national destiny continues to depend upon the military power which at once protects us from external attack, and constitutes the backbone of our foreign policy posture. Reasonable and informed Americans recognize that this state of affairs will probably continue to exist until the arrival of that elusive millenium when men and nations will at last conduct themselves according to the Ten Commandments—God's; not Galbraith's.

This particular domestic battle will not be easily won. Like the war in Vietnam, it is somewhat different from anything we in uniform have experienced in our past. Barbs hurled by the New Left, or by public figures who seek to convert public confusion and unease into political capital are neither new to U.S. society nor difficult to understand. Complexity enters the picture when current domestic ills are added, and the waters are muddied by self-seeking cop-outs from responsibility, on the one hand, and opportunists on the other. Finally, the confrontation is further complicated by an ingredient uncomfortably unfamiliar to the modern American fighting man: the necessity for him to defend to his own countrymen his motivation, his judgment, and above all, his integrity. This latter, of course, is the hardest cheese of all to swallow. Nevertheless, it must be done.

We have the resources and the capability to combat the assaults now being made upon the military. Even General Shoup admits that the American armed forces include large numbers of intelligent and articulate individuals. They must make themselves heard. In speeches, in writings, and in general conversation. The opportunities are myriad; we need only seize them.

Again one must insist that this is the worst possible moment for the American Servicemen to react to the current attacks with injured feelings, righteous indignation, panic, or withdrawal. Unlike Tommy Atkins, no Kipling speaks for us to remind Americans, as Kipling warned the British, that "Tommy ain't a bloomin' fool—you bet that Tommy sees!" To honor the oath we have taken, we must speak for ourselves. If we do so with the same dedication and professionalism that we have so abundantly displayed on wartime battlefields, we shall be equally successful in protecting this nation against those who now endanger it from within.

For, given the whole picture—not just the slanted and perverted glimpse being broadcast these days—the American people will speak out with the sound and reasoned majority voice which will preserve the United States and its democratic processes. They have done thus for two hundred years. If we in the military keep our heads and faithfully honor the whole of our oath of office, they will be able to do so for another two hundred.

POSTAL REFORM AND THE UNION SHOP

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, one feature of the present legislation regarding postal reform which has been advanced by the administration is the introduction of the union shop principle for Federal employees. In his testimony before the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, Postmaster General Winton Blount conceded that in States not having right-to-work statutes the union shop can be put into effect among postal workers. And there seems to be doubt as to whether those States having right-to-work laws would be excepted.

The March 20 issue of the Coshocton Tribune ran a column by the author and columnist, John Chamberlain, which warns against the use of the union shop in the postal reform package now being considered by Congress. His column "Flaw in Postal Reform Bill" follows:

FLAW IN POSTAL REFORM BILL

(By John Chamberlain)

President Nixon's blueprint for turning the mails over to an independent government corporation similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority has been approved by the House of Representatives Post Office Committee. So the postal reform people—and this includes most of us—may very well feel like giving three cheers.

On second thought we had better limit ourselves to two cheers or maybe a cheer-and-a-half. For, while an efficient government-owned but independently run postal corporation might do something to eliminate mail deficits, the bill, as it goes to the Rules Committee of the House, contains what has been called by the National Right to Work Committee the "hidden menace" of compulsory unionism.

Indeed, the bill would never have gotten past the formidable opposition of James Rademacher, the boss of the letter carriers union, if Postmaster General Winton Blount had not given in on the union shop question. If the bill goes through as it is now shaped up, it will be considered an unfair labor practice if the proposed new independent postal corporation refuses to bargain over the union shop.

This amounts to a 180-degree turnaround by President Richard Nixon. It was just about six months ago that the President reaffirmed the old John F. Kennedy principle that no federal worker should be compelled to join a union in order to hold his job. But now this principle—of according non-discrimination in hiring to U.S. citizens—is to be abandoned.

True enough, Postmaster General Blount has a rationale which he offers as an excuse for surrendering to the Rademacher union demands. By an ingenious quibble he argues that, once the post office is turned over to an independent body, the postal workers will no longer be "federal" employees. The Nixon executive order about a federal right-to-work guarantee would therefore, in Blount's estimation, cease to be operative. And the labor law of the land, which permits bargaining over the union shop in all the non-right-to-work-law states, must hold for all non-federal workers under the equal rights provision of the Constitution.

Such reasoning, however, is faulty on two counts. One is that it does not reckon with a logical inconsistency in the bill itself. The proposed legislation contains a clause that would prohibit strikes against the new corporation. Well, if the right to strike is to be denied, surely the right to bargain for a union shop could be prohibited, too. If Mr. Blount's stipulated "principle" can be ignored once, it can be ignored twice.

The more important objection to the Blount rationale is that turning a government function over to an "independent" corporation owned by the government does not "de-federalize" it. The hope is that a TVA-like mail corporation will be able to operate in the black. But what if it doesn't? What if it can't raise enough money in the private money market to construct new offices and to pay its bills? The Federal government would have to stand behind its obligations as the owner. If deficits should prove to be chronic, the taxpayer would be called upon to satisfy the creditors. Thus it is specious reasoning to say that the executive order shielding government employes against compulsory unionism should not be applied to postal workers under the proposed new law. A federally-owned corporation must, by definition, have federal employes.

The White House is going all out to push the new postal authority bill through. And Heaven knows it is time for postal reform. An independent mail-carrying body, whose ruling executive council would be composed of two Senators, two members of the House, seven Presidential appointees, and a director general and his deputy, would be an improvement on the present patronage-ridden organization. It would be even better if private enterprise were permitted to compete with the new government body. But if we are to continue with a national mail monopoly, there is no excuse for saddling it with a union shop, which could deny employment to non-union taxpayers who are, after all, part owners of anything that their government possesses.

HON. "TIC" FORRESTER

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of "Tic" Forrester's death last week—over the years we served together in the House I valued his friendship and admired his ability. "Tic" was small in stature, but he had a mighty voice and a great heart. He had strong opinions, and fought hard—and effectively—for his beliefs. I believe all who knew "Tic" derived benefit simply from knowing him and the way he lived his life—with strength and integrity and loyalty to his principles. While he was in Congress, "Tic" served the Nation and his district ably and honorably, and during his retirement he continued to be a valuable and contributing citizen. I am grateful for having had the opportunity to know "Tic," and I extend my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Forrester on his death, and share her loss.

RAILROAD EMPLOYMENT ACT AMENDMENT NEEDED TO HELP UNEMPLOYED WORKERS

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take our colleagues' time this afternoon long enough to explain a serious situation which has come about as a result of legislation passed unanimously by this House in the 90th Congress.

In February 1968, President Johnson signed into law the 1968 amendments to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. While this act included many improvements of the railroad unemployment insurance program, it also included a provision which adversely affects those railroad employees who need unemployment insurance protection most.

I am referring to section 4(a)(1)(iii), which makes railroad employees who receive severance pay or separation allowances ineligible to receive unemployment insurance benefits for the period covered by their severance pay. On its face, this may appear to be a reasonable limitation, but in practice it poses serious and unnecessary hardship.

As an example, I cite the case of over 400 employees in my congressional district, most of whom will be out of work after the Penn Central Railroad closes its car shop facilities in East Rochester, N.Y., on April 1.

I think, overall, the Penn Central, considering its shaky financial condition, has tried to be fair to these employees. The railroad offered jobs outside of the Rochester area—most outside New York State—to any employee who was willing to move.

Also, the railroad is paying the equivalent of 360 days pay as severance pay to employees remaining in the Rochester area. But in most cases, the employees involved are men who have given the best years of their lives to the railroad. They have worked at the car shops 10, 20, or 30 years. They and their wives and children—and in some cases grandchildren—have deep roots in their community. From many standpoints, it is difficult to imagine how they could relocate to a strange and distant community. This is borne out by the fact that the vast majority of these Penn Central employees have decided to remain in East Rochester.

But even with the severance pay they will receive, almost to a man they and their families face a very difficult economic future: In a softening employment market, these men are finding equivalent jobs, and in some cases any jobs, difficult to find. Men earning $3.78 an hour find that the only jobs they can find mean a cut in pay of 30 to 40 percent of their present wage. A great number of these men are over 40, and thus find it even more difficult to find suitable reemployment. While their jobs have disappeared, their family and economic obligations remain.

Some would argue that the 360-day severance allowance is enough to compensate for these hardships. Not so. Assuming it will take many weeks, or even months for many of these men to find new work, the severance pay is in fact far less than the income these men have received on the railroad.

The severance pay is equivalent to wages not including any of the substantial fringe benefits these men have enjoyed as railroad employees. These men will be required to purchase health insurance amounting to $50 or more a month for their families. They are ineligible for sick pay. The fact that severance pay is paid to them in lump sum has a tremendous adverse effect on the withholding computation. The withholding tax rate is figured as if the total severance payment is the amount the employee earns in a single pay period, rather than over a full 16-month period.

So the severance allowance is in no sense equivalent to compensation these men would receive if the car shop facility were to remain open. Nor should it be looked upon as income to cover the period of 360 working days—or 16 months—which it supposedly covers. In a sense, this payment is a subjective valuation of the hardship caused to the employee and his family by his termination of employment by the railroad. It has only theoretical relationship to his compensation over any given period of time.

Mr. Speaker, if these employees were to receive severance pay after termination of nonrailroad job, they would nonetheless be allowed to collect unemployment benefits, since New York State does not make recipients of severance pay ineligible for unemployment.

The fact that this prohibition in the 1968 amendments to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act was agreed to by both labor and management representatives in negotiations does not help to alleviate the hardship of those workers and their families who are affected by this provision. This was a step backward in our legislative program of helping terminated and retired railroad workers to adjust to their loss of railroad work.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore urge my colleague to give favorable and prompt support to this measure.

DR. B. JEAN APGAR HONORED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

HON. HOWARD W. ROBISON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate a remarkable young scientist, Dr. B. Jean Apgar, a research biochemist with the Agricultural Research Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, on her selection as one of the outstanding women in the Federal Government. Dr. Apgar, who is stationed at the U.S. Plant, Soil, and Nutrition Laboratory in Ithaca, N.Y., is the youngest scientist ever to receive the Federal Women's Award.

For someone so young, Dr. Apgar has succeeded in making an extraordinary contribution to the field of nucleic acid chemistry and nutritional biochemistry. She played a vital role in determining the molecular structure of a ribonucleic acid—RNA—the first time that the structure of any nucleic acid had been revealed. This was an extremely significant piece of work, as RNA's help determine how living cells make and utilize proteins. And any understanding we have of the process by which this is done brings us that much closer to eventual control of genetic defects and certain diseases, including cancer.

Research had been in progress for 5 years before Dr. Apgar joined the team. Shortly afterward, she developed the critical techniques for using enzymes to split the RNA molecules. Her work provided the evidence that made it possible to finally identify and describe an RNA, a scientific finding of the highest magnitude. The information and techniques developed by Dr. Apgar and other members of the research team made it possible for the group to identify a second RNA in only 18 months' time. The man who directed the work—Dr. Robert Holley—was awarded the 1968 Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine.

Dr. Apgar maintains an interest in RNA and is considered an authority in the field. Scientists call upon her for advice and consultations on problems of ribonucleic acid chemistry and related areas of molecular biology.

In other studies, Dr. Apgar found that pregnant animals required much higher levels of dietary zinc than had been thought, in order to deliver their young safely. Her discovery will have marked effects on the dietary standards suitable for a number of animal species. And it will undoubtedly result in improved diets for pregnant women. Dr. Apgar's perceptive insight into the nature of research problems and her creative approach in resolving them mark her as a scientist of exceptional abilities. She combines the highest standards of scientific integrity with the highest personal values. She is a splendid example of what women in Government can offer—and achieve. I would hope that her example could attract more women of equal talent.

Dr. Apgar was born in Tyler, Tex. She holds B.A. and B.S. degrees from Texas Women's University, and M.S. and Ph. D. degrees from Cornell University.

JUDGE GEORGE HARROLD CARSWELL

HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I was first elected to Congress on November 3, 1942, and I am now completing the best 28 years of my life—the years I have served with my dedicated colleagues and good friends—both Democratic and Republican—from all sections of our beloved country.

During these years we have worked together to make this a better Nation for all our people to live in. We have taken tremendous strides in improving our economy, in building schools, in helping the needy, and in providing security and health care for our older citizens.

Perhaps most gratifying to me have been the advances we have made in civil rights for all citizens. Unfortunately, to be precise, I must amend that to say—advances we have made until very recently in civil rights.

In my 28 years we have seen the Armed Forces desegregated, we have seen the right of all citizens to vote assured, and we have seen decisions made and laws passed to give all citizens equality in housing, travel, public accommodations, employment, and education—in short—in all the rights of citizenship.

But we now have an administration in the White House that is obviously determined—for cold-blooded political reasons—to reverse our progress and to set us back to where we were when I came to Congress 28 years ago. The details are well known and I shall not repeat them here.

The crowning insult to those of us who have fought for true equality is the nomination of Judge George Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court. Here we have a politician, lawyer, and judge with a 100-percent negative record. While many learned jurists have attested that his actions have demonstrated mediocre ability, what ability and cunningness he possesses have been unfailingly devoted to suppressing the well recognized rights of our minority citizens. Time after time he has avoided, evaded, or ignored the Constitution and law of the land. He has entered into petty schemes and conspiracies to the same end. And he has insulted and abused those lawyers who have appeared before him in efforts to uphold our constitutional rights.

On June 30, 1969, I wrote to the President about certain actions of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In closing the letter, I said:

In addition, I wish to point out that the record of the Department since January 20, 1969, is most dismal. The enforcement of the Constitution and the laws of our nation and the preservation of the rights of our citizens are two of the most sacred trusts placed in the President of the United States. The confidence of our people and the stability of our Nation stand in the balance. Mr. President, you have taken a most solemn oath to preserve and to protect the Constitution and laws of the United States. You must not let the American people down.

In nominating Judge Carswell, President Nixon has let the American people down. This nomination must be rejected.

DEATH OF A GREAT AMERICAN CITIZEN: MAJ. GEN. JAMES EARL RUDDER

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is with infinite regret that I advise this body that one of the truly great citizens of our time is dead.

The citizen—who also happens to have been a remarkably close and affectionate friend of mine—was Maj. Gen. James Earl Rudder, who died on March 23, at the age of 59, while he occupied the position of president of Texas A. & M. University—the institution of which I, also, have the honor of being an alumnus.

The career of James Earl Rudder is an example to every generation of Americans—the ideal citizen-soldier, the inspirational leader of men, the enlightened educator of youth.

He was born in Brady, Tex. and worked his way through high school, just as so many of us in the depression generation were forced to do. He worked his way through Texas A. & M., too—and made a splendid record in every aspect of his college career. He was known not only as a student of the first rank, but also as an outstanding leader among his contemporaries.

After graduation he returned to Brady and began ranching on a small scale. Typically, in view of his lifelong interest in the development of youngsters, he coached the local high school team.

While at Texas A. & M. he had been a particularly impressive member of the corps and, naturally, was a reserve officer in the Army. When World War II broke out, he was called to be a leader of men in the protection of his beloved homeland.

His record as a soldier is one of the great stories of the war.

He was called to action in 1941, and organized and trained the famous 2d Ranger Battalion, which produced a great deal of significant history in the European theater.

Undoubtedly the greatest moment in the life of James Earl Rudder came on D-Day. His assignment was to assault and take the promontory of Point du Hoe—a sheer, 100-foot cliff standing between Omaha and Utah Beaches. If the impressively fortified Point due Hoe were not taken, it was highly unlikely that either of these vital beaches could be secured.

Earl Rudder and his men assaulted the promontory, climbed it under a withering fire, and captured it. Rudder was twice wounded in the engagement but remained in action.

Gen. Omar Bradley has made the definitive statement on what James Earl Rudder—then a lieutenant colonel—did on that day. He wrote:

> No soldier in my command has ever been wished a more difficult task than that which befell the 34-year-old commander of this ranger force.

If I may make a personal observation, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I returned to the Normandy Beaches in the company of General Rudder on the 20th anniversary of the invasion. We walked over the terrain together, both of us with long memories of deeds past, and of departed comrades.

We came to the foot of Point du Hoe and stared at it. I must say that I was personally appalled at the problem which had faced Earl Rudder and his men on that day. And yet it was exhilarating to know that men had such courage, such determination, such strength, and such skill as to turn such an assault into a victory.

Eventually, we went to the top of the promontory. Since we were both 20 years older, we did not make the same frontal assault which Earl Rudder and his men had made on that pivotal day in Western history. The amenities—and the reception—were very much better on this anniversary occasion than they had been on D-Day.

When we reached the top, I was deeply moved to find that the French—who, unfortunately, have been less than generous in allotting praise to the men of other nations who freed their land—had erected a monument in honor of the almost unbelievable heroism of James Earl Rudder and his men.

When he returned from the wars, General Rudder resumed ranching. But he also found time to serve as mayor of his hometown, and never relinquished his passionate interest in his alma mater.

In 1959 he was asked to accept the presidency of Texas A. & M. He did so, just as he accepted every worthwhile challenge in life.

His record as president has already become one of the most inspiring legends of the university.

In 1959, Texas A. & M. was a great, but smallish, institution, recognized far less than it should have been outside the boundaries of our State. It had only 7,500 students—all conspicuously male—and a reputation based principally upon its Spartan virtues, its insistence upon hard physical and mental work, and the excellence of the performance of its alumni in the defense of their country.

As president, General Rudder preserved all the virtues inherent in the university, but determined also to broaden its scope and widen its horizons. He even embarked on the course—at first considered heretical and abominable—of making Texas A. & M. coeducational. When he died, on March 23, the student body had doubled in number, and it had representatives from every State of the Union, and from 75 foreign nations as well.

And, I might add, the masculine students at Texas A. & M. are still conspicuously male, and that feminine students are still conspicuously female. There are, unfortunately, too few university student bodies today about which this statement could be made.

I cannot imagine General Rudder presiding over any institution in which this situation did not exist. He was a man of impressive intellectual attainment and of great compassion, but he was also devoted to, and insistent upon, the fundamental virtues which, in his opinion, and in mine, have made the Nation great and which must be encouraged if the Nation is to remain great.

Some while ago I rejoiced publicly that Texas A. & M. was alone among all the colleges of Texas in that it did not have on campus a chapter of the Students for a Democratic Society—a misnomer, if I ever heard one. This was not because of any repressive policies on the part of General Rudder. It was simply because he ran the kind of institution which would not be attractive to the SDS type, and he attracted a student body which would not be responsive to such activity.

Under General Rudder's administration, professors, and even deans, walked the campus in safety, in friendship and in mutual respect as far as the undergraduates were concerned.

During the past 11 years there were no demonstrations at Texas A. & M., no sit-ins, no occupations of university buildings, no hysterical outbursts of frenzied violence which have created so many nightmares on so many other campuses.

General Rudder was in charge at A. & M.; there never was any doubt about that, and he intended to keep it that way. He once announced that if agitators ever tried to create trouble on his campus, they would have "one hell of a fight."

"And," he added, "this pot-bellied President will be in the front ranks, leading it." It occurred to no one to doubt his word.

Mr. Speaker, when James Earl Rudder died I lost a dear and highly treasured friend. The loss is great and unforgettable, but it is purely personal.

Of much greater importance is the fact that when James Earl Rudder died, the Nation lost a magnificent citizen; a unique character, an enormous contributor to the well-being of our future generations.

It is often said that no man is irreplaceable. Perhaps this is true. But James Earl Rudder was a citizen of such a stature that I feel he was as close to being irreplaceable as any man I have known in public or private life.

All those who knew him, loved him. We are all vastly impoverished by his passing.

More importantly, the State of Texas and the entire Nation are impoverished by this loss of a magnificent citizen, a magnificent soldier, and a magnificent educator of men.

GET RID OF THE BOMBERS

HON. CHALMERS P. WYLIE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, recently a series of bombings has shocked the national conscience. Bomb terrorists have struck in California, Colorado, Washington, Michigan, and Maryland. From the evidence that has been gathered, it appears that a small group of young radicals and anarchists have decided that the only way to implement the social reforms they expouse is through violence and destruction. There is information that some of these individuals are affiliated with the Weathermen, a left-wing faction of the Students for a Democratic Society. In addition to the actual bombing, many cities have been gripped by telephone threats and numerous bomb scares, including Columbus. Lives have been lost, public facilities have had to be evacuated, and property has been destroyed. Existing Federal law, covering the sale and transportation of explosives, is not adequate to meet this new problem.

Today I have joined Congressman WILLIAM H. MCCULLOCH and others of my colleagues in cosponsoring President Nixon's legislation to strengthen our laws dealing with explosives. This proposed legislation provides a penalty of 10 years in prison and/or a fine of $10,000 for anyone involved in the transportation or receipt of explosives intended to be used for unlawful purposes. It further provides for capital punishment when there has been a death to an individual, as the result of such bombings. There appeared in today's Washington Daily News an editorial which I feel is worthy of note by all Members of this body, concerning "Bombers." I commend this editorial to my colleagues with a request that we act, and act immediately to stop these destardly deeds:

GET RID OF THE BOMBERS

President Nixon has sent to Congress a bill intended to crack down—and crack down hard—on bomb throwers, would-be bomb-throwers and those kooks who call up and say falsely a bomb has been planted in your home or your office, or your car, or somewhere.

This is a first-class bill, and Congress should pass it as fast as the legislative process will permit.

It is a first-class bill because it is tough. It proposes to impose hard penalties on the offenders.

Simple possession of a bomb, or any other destructive device of this type, would draw an imprisonment of up to 10 years. Transporting one of these lethal gadgets or using it to damage a building could draw like penalties. If the explosion injured anybody, the penalty would be doubled, and if anyone should die the punishment could be a death sentence.

None of this is excessive. Screwballs who resort to bombs, whatever their motives or pretended motives, deserve no sympathy at all. There is only one way to deal with them—put them out of business.

As the President noted, there recently has been an alarming increase in this type of murderous mischief. And there is no reason to meet this problem with "patience or indulgence." Violence demands the sternest type of government enforcement. If Congress chooses to make the Nixon bill even tougher, it is all right with us. Just pass it, and fast.

MANNED SPACE SHUTTLE STATION SHOULD BE LOCATED AT CAPE KENNEDY

HON. PAUL G. ROGERS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the United States has put four men on the moon and other flights under the Apollo program will be forthcoming.

Yet, we must look beyond the next year or two. We must look toward other achievements and progress in the exploration of space.

One project being planned by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration is a space shuttle station which will be our first effort in the establishment of regularly planned space trips which will originate from an orbiting space station.

This space shuttle station will be launched within a few years, and the site for that launching is presently under consideration by the House Committee on Science and Astronautics.

I would like to enclose at this point in the RECORD, for the benefit of my colleagues, two editorials from newspapers which serve the Cape Kennedy, Fla., area concerning the location of the proposed space shuttle launching site.

The editorials follow:

[From Today, Mar. 7, 1970]

A CHANCE TO SPEAK

Brevard County, the state of Florida and the often forgotten taxpayer apparently are going to get an opportunity to speak up for the space shuttle program.

The Manned Space Flight Subcommittee of the House Committee on Science and Astronautics will hold a hearing in Brevard on where the shuttle should be launched from.

We know the answer. From the Kennedy Space Center.

KSC has the space (paid for), the buildings (paid for) and the talented people, trained and ready to go to work on the important shuttle program.

That any other area of the country could even be considered is incredible. KSC has a billion dollars invested in building a national resource, plus the necessary thousands of people to do the job.

We're glad the subcommittee, which wields considerable influence in Congress, sees fit to come down on the eve of Apollo 13 to hold hearings and get our side of the story.

But it's not just Brevard County's sales pitch that we want them to hear, it's the pitch of the long ignored taxpayer.

Remember him?

He's the guy who was totally ignored when the Manned Spacecraft Center was built in Texas, and ended up footing the bill for political foolishness.

Obviously other states would like to have the space shuttle located within their borders. When the time comes that shuttle craft are as common as airplanes, they'll get their share.

But until that time, only one place in the United States has all the necessary ingredients for a truly low-cost shuttle development and operation.

A word of caution to zealous Brevard boosters:

Let's not get so carried away with our own importance that we take the future for granted, or that we let something this important to our future get muddled down in local politics and personalities.

When the subcommittee shows up to hear our side of the shuttle story, let's approach it as a unified community showing genuine concern and support.

[From the Orlando (Fla.) Sentinel, Mar. 8, 1970]

ECONOMY AND COMMON SENSE DEMAND CAPE SHUTTLE STATION

The Nation made one space mistake when it put the manned spacecraft center at Houston under political pressure.

But it must not make another by locating the proposed space shuttle station anywhere but at the Kennedy Space Center.

Virtually everything needed for the shuttle station is at the Cape already. Duplicating facilities somewhere else would cost easily $1 billion. In a time of inflation and austerity in government, the nation cannot afford a needless waste of this magnitude.

The space shuttle has been described by Dr. Leroy Day, chief of NASA's space shuttle working group, as "the cornerstone of our future plans for doing anything in space."

Space shuttles to ply between earth and orbiting space stations are needed in the same way elevators are to reach the tops of buildings.

Envisioned by NASA are reusable space shuttle vehicles which can burn ordinary fuels and can take off and land from air bases or major airports.

Utilizing this concept would bring the price of a space flight down from about $1,000 to $100 a pound. Space officials, both military and civilian, have made a space shuttle system their No. 1 priority. Without it, our exploration of the space medium will be slowed.

Brevard County is asking to be heard before a federal decision is made on the shuttle transportation center.

President Nixon should grant this request, for Brevard County with its 80,000 acres of NASA-owned land plus millions in equipment, can make a stronger case than any other area of the country.

The strongest case of all, of course, is that the Cape will continue to be the No. 1 launching site for all future space missions.

No good purpose can be served by scattering our space effort.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN—HOW LONG?

HON. WILLIAM J. SCHERLE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. SCHERLE. Mr. Speaker, a child asks: "Where is daddy?" A mother asks: "How is my son?" A wife asks: "Is my husband alive or dead?"

Communist North Vietnam is sadistically practicing spiritual and mental genocide on over 1,400 American prisoners of war and their families.

How long?

ARKANSAS GENERAL ASSEMBLY URGES ACTION ON POW PROBLEM

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, the 67th general assembly of the State of Arkansas had adopted a resolution concerning U.S. servicemen who are being held as prisoners in North Vietnam. In part the measure commends efforts to increase interest in and awareness of the problems of POW's by the Arkansas Chapter of Concern for Prisoners of War, Inc., Mrs. Judy Fagan Hornibrook, chairman.

The resolution has been transmitted to me by the secretary of state, the Honorable Kelly Bryant. It was sponsored in the State senate by the Honorable Ben Allen of Little Rock.

I commend to my colleagues Senate Concurrent Resolution 4 of the General Assembly of Arkansas as an expression of concern for the plight of U.S. servicemen being held as prisoners by North Vietnam and a call for greater action in their behalf:

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION COMMENDING THE ARKANSAS CHAPTER, CONCERN FOR PRISONERS OF WAR, INC., MRS. JUDY FAGAN HORNIBROOK, CHAIRMAN, FOR THEIR EFFORTS TO MAKE THE CITIZENS OF ARKANSAS AWARE OF PROBLEMS RELATING TO PRISONERS OF WAR AND URGING PRESIDENT NIXON TO MAKE EVERY EFFORT TO SECURE AGREEMENT BY THE NORTH VIETNAMESE TO ABIDE BY RULES OF THE GENEVA CONVENTION

Whereas, the lives of many families in Arkansas are being adversely affected by the continuing refusal of the North Vietnamese government to abide by the articles of the Geneva Convention relating to prisoners of war, i.e., no exchange of frequent and regular mail between the prisoners of war and their families, no valid list of prisoners of war furnished, no impartial inspection of prison camps made, and no assurance that prisoners of war receive humane treatment; and

Whereas, the shortage and sometimes total lack of communication with these prisoners of war has led to great uncertainty and distress in the lives of wives, parents, and children of these Arkansas servicemen, thereby causing great anguish among these families;

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate of the first extraordinary session of the sixty-seventh general assembly of the State of Arkansas, the Senate concurring therein:

Section 1. That the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, meeting in Extraordinary Session on this date, does hereby commend the endeavors of the Arkansas Chapter, Concern For Prisoners of War, Inc., Mrs. Judy Fagan Hornibrook, Chairman, in its efforts to make the citizenry of Arkansas aware of these problems and conditions, and to urge President Richard M. Nixon to use every feasible method in cooperating with the concerned departments and agencies of our government, the United Nations, and the governments of other nations to secure North Vietnamese agreement to abide by the aforementioned rules of the Geneva Convention; we further urge all citizens of Arkansas to sustain vigorous efforts to secure the release of these servicemen.

Section 2. Upon adoption of this Resolution, the Secretary of the Senate shall cause a copy thereof to be transmitted to the President of the United States, to each member of the Arkansas Congressional Delegation, the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State of the United States.

FOREIGN MILITARY SALES ACT AMENDMENTS

HON. MICHAEL J. HARRINGTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I voted against the amendments to the Foreign Military Sales Act. This bill authorized up to $350 million in credits for arms sales, principally to less developed countries. I voted against the bill because I believe that the sale of such arms only serves to contribute toward discord in the rest of the world and encourages nations to purchase armaments which they do not need at the expense of essential domestic priorities.

Since 1945 some $66 billion worth of armaments have been sold in world markets by both governments and private arms merchants. These weapons have been used in all of the dozens of large and small wars since that time. There are virtually no international restrictions on this destructive and wasteful trade. In point of fact arms sales are actively promoted by all of the weapons manufacturing nations, our own included. This year alone U.S. sales of conventional weapons will total $1.9 billion.

At the same time that we are engaged in the strategic arms limitation talks we have, by passing the Foreign Military Sales Act, aggravated the very problem we hope to solve—increased armaments and increased world tension. We need to formulate a stricter policy of our Government's role in supplying arms to the rest of the world.

The President must undertake a comprehensive review of our military assistance programs, particularly with respect to sales of conventional arms. We must initiate discussions with other major powers and in the United Nations on ways to control the worldwide armaments trade, and I urge the President to signify the intention of the United States to control this trade.

If we are truly interested in arms control, we should not hold out inducements to other countries to buy arms, especially when those countries are underdeveloped and need to establish a stable economy which will provide for the most basic needs of their populations.

In this regard, I would like to have inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a copy of an article entitled, "Poor Nations Spend Fortune on Arms Purchases," which appeared in the New York Times on August 18, 1969. The article clearly demonstrates the fact that we and other nations are exporting and selling large quantities of arms to underdeveloped nations.

The article states that the Pentagon "has estimated the arms market of the non-Communist world during the period 1965–74 at $100 billion of which $70 billion would be domestically manufactured. This would put the arms trade at $30 billion or $3 billion a year, aside from sales within the Communist world. The Pentagon's own goal was to take half of this market, or $1.5 billion a year." The article also states that the "United States is rated the largest arms exporter in the world."

Mr. Speaker, this is a disgraceful situation which should command far more public attention than it has received. We must take a careful look at our present military policy. It is not consonant with our avowed foreign policy objective of disarmament and a world of peace.

The article follows:

POOR NATIONS SPEND FORTUNE ON ARMS PURCHASES

(By John L. Hess)

PARIS, August 17.—An ironic exception to the theme that the poor countries are getting poorer is in the possession of weapons.

Throughout the emerging nations, in Asia, Africa and Latin America, the poor man's arms race is gathering speed. For reasons of prestige and defense, so-called underdeveloped countries are buying everything from pistols to the most advanced and costly fighter-bombers, missiles, tanks, radar systems, even submarines.

The purchases are fueling such brushfire conflicts as the ones in Nigeria, the Middle East, the Sudan and Portugal's African territories.

Military expenditures of the underdeveloped countries are rising faster than their gross national products, a fact that means that a growing share of their slender resources is being diverted to weaponry.

Interviews with practitioners and scholarly analysts of the trade suggest that the arms race is virtually out of control, as all the industrial powers, from the United States and the Soviet Union to Portugal, Yugoslavia and Israel, compete actively for one of the world's most lucrative markets.

All but a trickle of the vast arms trade is theoretically under government control, since exports are licensed and closely watched. Nevertheless, rather than seeking to restrain the boom, nearly all governments of industrial or semi-industrial powers are actively promoting arms sale, either through public agencies or, as in the case of West Germany, through private or semiprivate organizations.

A few current examples demonstrate the problems.

A handful of private arms dealers have received mimeographed letters from the South Vietnamese Defense Ministry offering to sell them 202,887 small arms.

According to a dealer whose Saigon agent inspected the weapons, they range from "perfect" to "battlefield salvage," which he described as "covered with mud and blood."

Since these are only the first installment on a huge stock of surplus arms in South Vietnam, that country seems likely to become an important supply base for any new brushfire wars of the near future.

Current scandals in Sweden and Switzerland show that even the best intentions are often incapable of controlling the arms trade. Both countries are neutrals that manufacture arms to defend their neutrality. They also sell arms, to keep their weapons industries strong, but forbid exports to troubled areas.

Sweden was upset to learn that light planes made by Saab had been armed in France and used by Count Carl Gustaf von Rosen to bomb Nigerian bases on behalf of Biafra. An investigation is under way.

SWISS PREPARING CASE

The Swiss are preparing a prosecution in what has become known as the Oerlikon affair. Details have been withheld, but it is reliably affirmed that more than $21-million worth of Oerlikon antiaircraft guns and ammunition—some of it unused Government surplus—were delivered to the United Arab Republic, Israel, Lebanon, Nigeria, South Africa and Saudi Arabia. All are on the Swiss embargo list.

Oerlikon says "two or three employes" swung those deals without the knowledge of top management. It is reliably reported that the employes obtained from French customs officials documents professing that the destination for the arms was France. Most of them are said to have been shipped through Marseilles.

The crash of a planeload of arms on the way from Belgium to Nigeria a year ago brought questions in the Belgian Parliament, which had thought there was an embargo.

BELGIUM A SPECIAL CASE

In the trade, Belgium has the reputation of being an exceptionally easygoing transit point, and Antwerp is said to have a "bourse" in forged certificates. In any case, it is said, anyone who badly wants arms can obtain them, and even the lack of funds is not insurmountable.

Portugal and South Africa are reportedly major suppliers of Biafra, along with the French and, curiously, the Czechoslovaks—although just as curiously, the Soviet Union, Britain and the United Arab Republic are helping the Nigerian federal forces.

Rebel Sudanese are said to have obtained rifles from Ethiopia, which detests the Government at Khartoum, and the Kurds of Iraq gets arms from Iran, Turkey and Israel. Insurgents of the Portuguese territories in Africa are based in Algeria, Tanzania and the Congo and use small arms of Soviet design. The Portuguese use arms of their own manufacture and some French and American aircraft, despite a United States embargo.

NO PROOF OF C.I.A. ROLE

The United States Central Intelligence Agency is often said in the trade to be involved in some of these situations, but no proof has been forthcoming. A dealer said to have served the agency on occasion simply smiled and waved away a question about it.

But all this more or less clandestine small-arms business has about the same relation to the world arms trade as the windshield-wiper replacement business has to the automobile trade.

Samuel Cummings, an American who is president of the International Armaments Corporation, the world's largest private dealer in arms, puts private trade in small arms at a few tens of millions of dollars a year. This may be an underestimate, but in any case the total falls well short of a single important deal for planes, missiles, tanks, submarines or electronic defense systems.

$2.5-BILLION A YEAR

The Institute for Strategic Studies, a highly regarded private organization based in London, lists about 70 major arms transactions announced in the fiscal year 1967–68. The announced cost to the buyers totaled nearly $2.5-billion—not including 16 deals for which no cost figures were available.

Among the deals were huge sales of West German tanks to Italy and of American and French aircraft and missiles to Israel, as well as the Soviet rearmament of the United Arab Republic. All these would probably bring the total to $4-billion or more.

The Pentagon has estimated the arms market of the non-Communist world during the period 1965 through 1974 at $100-billion, of which $70-billion would be domestically manufactured. This would put the arms trade at $30-billion, or $3-billion a year, aside from sales within the Communist world. (The Pentagon's own goal was to take half of this market, or $1.5-billion a year.)

SALES EXCEED ESTIMATE

The figures for 1967–68 show that this estimate was already being exceeded a year ago.

As long as five years ago, underdeveloped countries were estimated by the Institute for Strategic Studies to be spending $10-billion a year on defense, of which $1-billion went for arms imports. Later studies, under way in Stockholm, London and Boston, are not yet available, but figures on military spending by individual countries in the underdeveloped world show a pattern of sharp increases in spending since 1965, both in cash totals and as a proportion of gross national product.

The third world may now be not far from the United States, which spends nearly one-tenth of its resources on military forces.

U.S. IN FIRST PLACE

Published figures are unreliable, but the United States is rated the largest arms exporter in the world, followed by the Soviet Union. France appears lately to have pushed Britain out of third place.

All four offer a complete range of arms for sale, except for the "ultimate" weapons—nuclear bombs and their carriers. (A German student of the arms race suggested tongue in cheek in an interview that since there have been no wars within the atomic club, the way to assure peace would be to give all countries atomic weapons.)

Behind the top four in arms sales come the specialist producers: Italy, West Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, the Netherlands, Czechoslovakia, Japan, Israel, Yugoslavia and Spain.

MOTIVES ARE THE SAME

The motivation for this drive, for both Communist and non-Communist countries, is the same. All countries engaged in modernization of their forces are generating large amounts of surplus weapons. Many, notably the United States, have balance-of-payments problems, that is, they are endangering their reserves of gold by paying more to foreigners than foreigners pay them. The Pentagon offsets its spending abroad by selling arms.

The weapons industry has become so large that layoffs would cause social unrest. In any case, most countries regard a strong and varied arms industry as essential to their defense and except for the big powers, none could afford such industries were it not for exports.

Major governments use arms deliveries as a political as well as economic instrument. A skeptic is John Stanley, a specialist of the Institute for Strategic Studies, who observed in an interview in London: "You don't make friends by delivering arms, but you certainly make enemies by stopping."

The institute, as a scholarly organization, takes no position on any political question. Mr. Stanley, speaking for himself, also voiced his opinion on a related matter. He said: "I see no justification for private people being engaged in the sale of surplus arms."

ARGENTINE CASE CITED

* * * vation, he cited the Argentine general's "Plan Europa"—the Europeanization of their weaponry, which had been almost entirely American. Orginally, their goal was modernization; they simply wanted the latest, most prestigious equipment, including fast, heavy tanks.

Washington refused to sell, arguing that such costly weapons were of no possible use to Argentina. Angered, the Argentines turned to France, which was eager to sell AMX 30's, among the finest tanks of their class in the world.

Mr. Cummings, the arms dealer, says that at the time he offered to sell the Argentines the tanks they originally sought, M–47 Pattons. The tanks would have come from West Germany, which is replacing the Pattons with its own Leopards, but the sale could have been made only with United States approval.

BID IS TURNED DOWN

Mr. Cummings said that his price, about $40,000 a tank, was less than one-third the United States price for Pattons and one-fifth the cost of the AMX. But, he said, a high Argentine official told him, "We are sick of the United States." Argentina bought French.

American efforts to keep supersonic fighters out of South America were similarly frustrated by Peruvian and Brazilian purchases of French equipment.

A current affair of the same nature involves India and Pakistan. In their border war of 1965, both sides used mainly American equipment, provided for their defense against China and the Soviet Union. Washington was reluctant to replace their losses, not only because it did not want a repetition of the fighting, but also because sales to either side incurred the enmity of the other.

A LEAKY EMBARGO

But India began obtaining Soviet equipment, and Pakistan got some Chinese tanks. The American embargo, officially maintained, sprang large leaks. West Germany sold surplus American F–86 Sabre jets to Iran, which sold them to India, and the West Germans also sold surplus British Sea Hawks to Italy, which sold them to Pakistan.

Deals by Pakistan to obtain more Patton tanks by way of West Germany, Italy and Turkey have so far not been completed, but have generated considerable resentment or embarrassment for all the countries involved, including the United States.

Individual supplier countries have proved incapable of effectively halting the sale of arms to troubled areas or curbing the supply of intricate and costly equipment to countries that cannot afford them and indeed can hardly use them. (Some countries have bought tanks too heavy for their roads and bridges, and the Institute for Strategic Studies says one government owns tanks it has not issued to its army "for reasons of internal security.")

EVEN MODEST ATTEMPTS FAIL

In the absence of an international arms control agreement, the principle that prevails is, "If we don't sell them, somebody else will." But even the most modest proposals for international cooperation have foundered.

The closest allies of the United States in Europe have steadfastly resisted the Pentagon's program for standardization of arms in the Western alliance. Their view is that although this might save money it would mean total dependence on the American industry. As a result, a salesman for an American plane company said, "a lot of unnecessary money is being spent on reinventing the wheel."

Denmark tentatively suggested in the United Nations last year that all arms sales be registered. This met reactions ranging from indifference to hostility—notably from the third world. India, especially, argued that arms-trade controls automatically discriminated in favor of the arms-producing countries and against the have-not countries. The proposal was dropped.

Some students of the arms trade, among them Mr. Stanley of the Institute for Strategic Studies, hold that the public conscience is nevertheless a potential brake on undesirable dealings. He felt that governments should be held accountable for their countries' arms-sales policy, and that when they are, changes sometimes result. He cited the 1967–68 Senate arms hearings that ended the huge, secret revolving credit fund used by the Pentagon to promote exports without knowledge of the Congress.

"The United States has tried to be responsible and not to fuel the arms race," Mr. Stanley said, "but these principles are constantly being undermined by economic compulsions."

Dr. Morris Pearton, a British historian who has been studying economic aspects of the arms race for the institute, was struck by attitudes he had met in the United States. He said:

"Some American firms told us that 'being in the arms business is good for us in the stock market.' Nobody in Europe said that. The fact that business wants some things needs no further justification in the United States."

PRIVATE DEALERS SCORED

John Kenneth Galbraith, the economist and author, has suggested that all companies whose business comes mainly from the government be nationalized.

Governments do use private dealers to dispose of weapons for a variety of reasons, among them to avoid publicity. The dealers say that with their worldwide networks of agents, they know better than some governments where surplus arms may be sold, although the service is one that military and commercial attachés of embassies are supposed to render.

To the extent that one motive for poor countries to buy arms is to enrich their leaders, the private dealer is in a better position than governments to satisfy the demand. Mr. Cummings, who is reputed to be a "straight" operator, or one who abides by United States and British controls, says the payoff—"dash" in Africa, "baksheesh" in the Middle East and "mordida" in Latin America—is prevalent throughout the third world.

Interviewed in London while he was visiting one of his plants, where thousands of rifles were being reconditioned or "sporterized," Mr. Cummings estimated that there were about 15 serious private arms brokers in the trade.

He himself has agents in every country of the world, he said. They are wealthy men—planters, industrialists, retired generals or politicians—who take no salary but negotiate their commissions for each deal. He hesitated to make an estimate, but said that 5 per cent would be "safe" on a big deal.

COSTA RICA GETS PRAISE

All this is small in relation to the business done by government agencies of the United States, Britain, France, the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia, or by many private corporations. For example, at least 45 American aerospace companies have offices in the major West European capitals, promoting sales that run into billions of dollars a year. They have a trade organization and are indistinguishable in their work and style of living from colleagues in other lines of business.

Mr. Cummings is not worried about the competition. "We are bound to be kept busy," he said, "in Africa, Latin America and, you can say, the Middle East."

"The only country in Latin America with any brains about military equipment," he added, "is Costa Rica: it has no tanks, no real fighters and no navy—and it gets along fine."

"There is no plumbing the depths of the arms trade," he concluded, "any more than there is plumbing the depths of human folly."

THE HONORABLE JAMES B. UTT

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, when I first came here nearly 8 years ago, Congressman James Utt was very kind and courteous making my first few months in Washington so much easier, and from that time his kindness never faltered and was always a great comfort.

For nearly 20 years he ably served his district, his State, and his Nation. It was an honor to have served in the California delegation with James Utt. The vital energy, expertise and concern he evidenced both in this Chamber and in his life will be greatly missed.

My sympathy is extended to his gracious widow, Charlena, and the other members of his fine family.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

HON. WILLIAM L. HUNGATE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Speaker, I think the following article in reference to the Tax Reform Act of 1969 will be of interest:

[From the Christian Science Monitor]

FEDERAL TAX LOOPHOLES PLUGGED

(By Richard A. Nenneman)

WASHINGTON.—"We know the tax reform was a good law," a high Treasury Department official jested—"You should see the mail we're getting complaining about it."

He was referring to the Tax Reform Act of 1969, passed in a hurry before the Christmas recess of Congress. At first glance it looked more like a tax giveaway than a real reform.

Not everyone agrees with this man's estimate of the law. Dr. Arthur M. Okun, for example, former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Johnson, sad: "I am disappointed with the tax reform act. . . . For every dollar we gained, we had to give up three. What we have left of the federal revenue is better, but we lost some of it in the process."

These are the views, not only of Dr. Okun, but of many liberal economists who say the tax cuts in the act undermine the financial base for needed federal programs in the coming years.

REFORMS CALLED REAL

Joseph W. Barr, who was Mr. Johnson's last Treasury secretary, points out, however, that the reforms in the act are indeed reforms. He distinguishes these from the tax-relief provisions which, like Dr. Okun, he dislikes. (Mr. Barr now is president of the American Security & Trust Company in Washington.)

"You never pick up revenue on a reform bill itself," says another source, adding that rates can be boosted later.

"Just look at the major loopholes under the old law," said Mr. Barr. (It was he who last year called public attention to the 154 persons with incomes over $200,000 who paid no federal taxes at all.)

"There were six main loopholes that caused the inequities under the old law—capital gains, exemption of municipal-bond interest, accelerated depreciation, the unlimited charitable contribution, farm losses, and depletion. They closed up every one of them except municipals."

The municipal-bond-interest exemption would have gotten changed, most observers say, if the nation's mayors and governors hadn't panicked and pressured Congress not to end the tax shelter for their indebtedness. So this remains for the "next time" around.

EXEMPTION HELD COSTLY

As matters stand, the holders of municipals save in income taxes far more than the municipalities save in extra interest expense. This is one of those social arrangements that helps rich individuals more than the groups it was meant to help. It is, in short, a costly exemption. The Treasury Department in 1969 estimated the municipal-interest exemption costs the government $2 billion annually.

As for the other five loopholes, they were indeed changed. Accelerated depreciation of real estate has been severely limited. Farm losses, that can be balanced against regular income, are limited to $25,000 annually. The oil depletion allowance was cut back from 27½ percent to 22 percent. And the unlimited charitable deduction was curbed, although at the same time the regular charitable contributions deduction was raised from 30 to 50 percent of income.

The change that may hit the greatest number of people is in the capital-gains tax. It previously had a top limit of 25 percent. That rate remains on the first $50,000 of capital gains in any one year, and then goes up to a maximum of 35 percent for individuals. (The rate was changed to 30 percent for corporations.)

ESCAPE DEVICES CLOSED

In cases where taxpayers also have substantial earned income, large capital gains may cause some to lose their 50 percent maximum tax bracket on the earned income and pay the old rate of 70 percent. (This is because "preference" income from capital gains, for example, in excess of $30,000 takes away the 50 percent limit for an equal amount of earned income.) In extreme cases, the new capital-gains tax could be an effective 46.5 percent.

In dollars, these changes may not be terribly significant. The capital-gains change, for instance, is supposed to haul in only $275 million extra a year from individuals and $175 million from corporations.

This doesn't make the loophole adjustments unimportant, however. These were the main devices by which the rich escaped taxes. To the extent that they have been closed, it is now a fairer system.

Critics of the federal tax system previously have claimed that as fast as one set of loopholes was closed, tax attorneys found a new set. Some of those who worked on this law doubt that this now will be the case. They think not only that major progress was made in closing loopholes, but that the increase in the capital-gains tax will blunt the incentive to qualify as much income as possible as a capital gain.

LOSSES SET AT $9 BILLION

With capital-gains rates up and the maximum rates on earned income down from 70 to 50 percent, the maximum tax-rate differential between the two kinds of income is cut by two-thirds. The result is that both kinds of income tend to be treated more equally under the tax laws.

The staggering revenue losses, coming to $9 billion, under the total reform act are its most disturbing feature. When all the provisions have been phased in (by 1973), there will be an annual loss of $4.8 billion from the increase in the personal exemption; $1.6 billion from the increased standard deduction; $2.1 billion from the low-income allowance (which removes 5.5 million persons from the tax rolls); and $420 million from the adjustment of single-person income-tax schedules (although there is a considerable improvement in fairness here).

There is a further loss of $4.4 billion from the increase in social-security payments. The funds come from a separate trust fund, however, and social-security officials said there is no need yet to raise social-security taxes. They will doubtless go up in the course of time, though.

In general, there is a tendency here to minimize the importance of the tax-relief provisions. The main thing is that a major reform was passed. The revenue losses as noted above, tend to be regarded as the price of reform.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS LISTED

Stanley Surrey, professor at Harvard Law school, Cambridge, Mass., summarized the improvements in the law:

The taxes on the poor and near-poor were reduced, through the low-income allowance. However, Professor Surrey asked, if we have decided that the poor shouldn't have to pay income tax, why do they still have to pay the regressive social-security tax?

A greater degree of equity exists for those earning up to $20,000 a year. The increase in the standard deduction to $2,000 tends to put apartment dwellers, who have neither mortgage interest nor property taxes to deduct, on an even footing with their suburban home-owning cousins.

Some feel it might be more equitable for most of the personal deductions to be removed in toto. This is one of those simplifications of the law that would run into much organized opposition, however; much the same effect is gained by giving a larger deduction to everyone. The Internal Revenue Service expects an additional 11 million taxpayers to start using the simplified 1040 form next year instead of itemizing deductions.

The increased exemptions are most valuable to the lower- and middle-income classes. They also are more valuable to big families.

WAGE-EARNERS' EQUALIZER

The reduction in the maximum rate on earned income to 50 percent equalizes taxes for those whose main income is from wages—such as professional people or athletes—vis-a-vis those who have more opportunities to use tax shelters.

There is a new 10 percent flat tax on 10 classes of income previously exempted. This will bring in only about $600 million in revenues to start. But it should end the spectacle of very wealthy people escaping all taxation.

All in all, there will be somewhat less likelihood of those with similar real incomes paying substantially different taxes. (Economists call this horizontal equity.)

It isn't as clear what has happened to vertical equity—the relative equity between divergent income groups. It depends, in the first place, on how much of a load one thinks the rich ought to carry. But that consideration aside, it isn't even that easy to tell what has happened. The poor and lower-income groups get the most benefit from the reform as far as direct taxes go.

But this tax reform is being "paid" for largely by a higher burden being placed on the corporate-income tax. To the extent that this is really borne by the public, by increased prices, etc. (the next article takes up this point), it can be argued that what the poor gained in lower direct taxes has been put back on their shoulders through the corporation income tax.

The most significant thing about the law to this reporter is that the system has shown itself capable of at least being nudged.

DIRECTION RULED IMPORTANT

The degree of change may not be as important as the direction. If the oil industry is not hurt by the change in depletion allowances, it will probably be cut again. If the accumulation of capital does not suffer noticeably, the capital-gain tax may be pushed up some more.

As a postscript, it is perhaps time for the public to become more aware of the role of capital formation by individuals in a capitalistic society. Is it passé or do we still need to encourage it?

Dale Wickham, a Washington tax lawyer who served as special counsel to the Senate Finance Committee last year, goes so far as to question whether we might not eventually tax capital gains as regular income. The use of income averaging, he says, would cushion the burden on anyone realizing large gains in any one year.

In last year's reform, we went a long step in the direction of his suggestion. Before going any further, we need to decide more clearly whether it is still meaningful to talk of a capital gain as some special kind of income. In the past, society has recognized a risk inherent in all capital investment. To encourage that risk-taking, it held out a special incentive.

Whatever remains to be done with the federal income tax, one point should be remembered: it is the shining jewel among American taxes. This will become more apparent after the corporation income tax, sales tax, and the property tax have been analyzed.

OUR SAGGING MERCHANT MARINE

HON. BOB WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the most critical problems facing our Nation is the pressing need to revitalize our sagging merchant marine fleet. During the past decade, our merchant marine posture has sunk to an all-time low, but the Nixon administration is determined to remedy this situation by making a substantial investment in the improvement of the merchant fleet.

I am pleased to include the following article by John Farina, maritime writer for the San Diego Evening Tribune, in the RECORD:

[From the San Diego Evening Tribune, Mar. 18, 1970]

PORTS OF CALL: MARITIME NEWS

(By John Farina)

The Russians are coming, says Federal Maritime Commission Chairman Helen Delich Bentley, and they're coming by the sea. The result has been a slippage of prestige for the United States in maritime power during the past 10 years.

The Soviets, remarks Mrs. Bentley, appointed to her post last year by President Nixon, "speak of the profits made by their ships in trade with the world. They speak of the foreign ports they enter and they boast of the fact that their seamen serve as ambassadors, cementing friendship for Russia and advancing the Communist view.

"What they do not speak of publicly, but what has become evident to maritime nations, is the extent to which modern, newly constructed Russian ships have now begun to undercut world shipping rates in competition with ships of other nations."

The competitive position of the United States vis-a-vis the Soviet Union will improve, Mrs. Bentley believes, with adoption by the Congress of President Nixon's program to revitalize the maritime industry.

The House recently authorized expenditure of $429.3 million for the maritime administration in fiscal 1971.

About half of that amount—$199.5 million—would be earmarked for construction of 19 merchant ships. Only 10 ships are being funded in the current fiscal year.

Nixon has recommended early enactment of the legislation, which will permit the construction of 300 merchant ships over a 10-year period. A 30-ships-a-year rate would be reached in fiscal 1973.

The second largest item in the authorization bill is $193 million for ship operation subsidies.

THREE SIGNIFICANT MARITIME CHANGES NOTED

The legislation, according to Rep. Hugh L. Carey, D-N.Y., would bring about three significant changes in this country's maritime efforts.

First—It would broaden the merchant marine program by encouraging the development of all segments of the industry.

Second—It would significantly increase the number of new ships being built each year in American shipyards, tripling the number constructed in recent years and projecting a steady high level of ship building for at least the next decade.

Third—It would give impetus to U.S. efforts to increase the American-flag share of imports and exports.

This last point, Carey says, is the "keystone of the program—because building ships without seeing to it that they have cargo would be a gross waste of the taxpayer's money.

"The ultimate success of the Maritime Act of 1970 will be determined by how significantly we increase the amount of cargo moving in the holds of American vessels."

The program thus is an ambitious one, Carey says, marking an important upward surge in the nation's maritime investment.

LEGISLATION PROVIDES BARE-BONES EFFORT

Even so, he adds, the legislation in his opinion is a "barebones maritime" effort.

"Because of the state of the economy, the funds that this program represents may be all that we can expect in the coming fiscal year. But they do not even come close to what I think we should be spending—or to what I think we must spend in the future."

Development of the U.S. maritime industry is vitally important, Carey says, "in terms of increased self-reliance in bringing raw goods to America to fuel our industrial complex and in carrying finished products to waiting consumers around the globe—in terms of a more adequate defense capability—in terms of our balance of payments—and, of even greater importance, in terms of sustaining life on this planet in the decades to come."

Maritime Administrator Andrew E. Gibson says challenge and opportunity are the important keys to development of the merchant marine fleet.

"The Maritime Commission is challenged," he says, "to better serve the maritime industry and the American public. American importers and exporters are challenged to use American-flag ships. And American investors are challenged to provide the $5 billion or so in new capital the shipping and shipbuilding industries will need to modernize their operations and provide new ships and equipment. The President's program will offer this last group the opportunity to achieve this."

PUBLIC MORE AWARE OF SEAPOWER VALUE

In San Diego, John V. Banks, executive vice president of National Steel and Shipbuilding Co., comments that during the past two years "there has been an increasing public awareness of the fundamental value of seapower that has, since the days of the clipper ships, made our country economically and militarily strong.

"They saw ships, not planes, delivering more than 95 per cent of the cargo needed to support the war in Vietnam. They saw the uncontestable value of our aircraft carriers sustaining two years of air strikes without a single loss.

"They saw our balance of payments getting incredibly out of balance. And some of them saw the growing threat of Russian seapower.

"Perhaps fortuitously, many started to question the relative priority of space exploration to the needs here on earth . . . As a result of this awareness, important shifts in priorities have taken place. President Nixon has wisely committed his administration to the rebuilding of the Navy and the merchant marine."

DAUGHTERS OF PENELOPE

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, women leaders are more and more in the news every day. In fact, there is a redefinition of the rights and responsibilities of women occurring in our society.

I should like to share with my colleagues a pertinent speech by Joanna—Mrs. Charles J.—Panagopoulos, grand president of the Daughters of Penelope and proponent of a most positive approach to this subject.

In her speech, Mrs. Panagopoulos paid tribute, on behalf of the Daughters of Penelope, to one of America's most noted women, the Honorable MARGARET CHASE SMITH. As a tribute to Senator SMITH and to women, I should like to include this fine address in the RECORD.

The festivities of this evening constitute a significant milestone in the 40 year history of the Daughters of Penelope.

Heretofore, our Order, in the national, district and local levels, has concerned itself, and engaged in, activities of a charitable nature—such as scholarship assistance, financial aid to our religious institutions, drives for the collection of funds in support of various charities, and programs designed to preserve the best of our Hellenic heritage and traditions, and adapt them to, and thus enrich, our American culture.

All laudable and necessary activities, which must be continued and intensified. But they are also the traditional aims of most women's organizations.

This evening marks the addition of a new dimension to our perspective of life—an expansion of the limits of our concern and the boundaries of our activities.

This new concern, for us as an organization, is the awareness and acknowledgement that the Daughters of Penelope must take part, in some form, in the general attempt to obtain for the women of our country the guarantees, under the law, of the equal treatment, rights, privileges and opportunities in all aspects of life, which modern thinking demands for every individual—male and female.

We all have heard that statement that "The hand that rocks the cradle, is the hand that rules the world"—A man said that!—And no doubt that when those lines were first written over one hundred years ago, women could only rule the world, or help rule it—vicariously—, they were too busy rocking the cradle and performing the chores attendant to that circumstance.

However, to use a trite but true phrase—Things have changed! That cradle is now automated. Modern technology has taken care of that. And, therefore, woman now has far more time to interest herself and participate in fields which once she barely had time to hear about.

Much better educated, far more aware of the world around her as a result of advanced communications and with more available time, the woman of today aspires not to rule the world, but to be a full and effective partner in its development—in the arts and sciences, in education, in business and banking, and in that area of human endeavor which most immediately affects the lives of all of us—government.

However, due to encrusted and antiquated attitudes which have been allowed to remain unchanged because of our own passivity—woman has not been granted her full freedom to give of her understanding, abilities and talents to the advancement of our society.

This year will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the 19th Amendment under which women were granted the constitutional right to vote. Five decades have passed—progress has been made—but the pace is too slow. Another decade should not be permitted to pass without woman's achieving full equality in all fields of endeavor.

That is why the Daughters of Penelope, as an organization, must concern itself with this cause.

By participation, I certainly do not mean taking to the streets with protest signs, or disrupting the normal processes and procedures of government.

Rather, I mean the participation in efforts, projects, and activities designed to constantly remind those in authority of the inherent injustice of the status of women as it exists in our society today.

And that brings us to the purpose of this evening's affair. What would be more fitting and proper to publicly signal this new area of concern of the Daughters of Penelope than to recognize and salute those women, who have been, and still are, in the forefront of this cause of obtaining equal rights and opportunities for all persons—regardless of sex.

This evening, we have chosen to express our gratitude and appreciation to those women who have selected as their field of endeavor the art and science of politics and government, because that field, as I previously said, most immediately affects our daily lives.

We hope and expect that these events, which will be held biennially, will recognize and honor other women who have shown by their achievements in the field of education, the arts and sciences, the business world, and in the medical, legal and judicial professions, that there is truly no difference between the sexes in ability and talent in these respective fields.

At this time, I would like to thank Sister Elizabeth Athanasakos and her committee for the arrangements of this evening's program.

However, this event is given depth and significance by the presence of our honored guests, who have been introduced by our Chairman.

To these remarkable ladies, whose dedicated service to our country, and outstanding records of personal achievement serve as an example and an inspiration to us all, I personally, and on behalf of the Grand Lodge, and all the members of the Daughters of Penelope, express my sincere appreciation for their presence here this evening.

Yet, we cannot speak of remarkable women, outstanding records, dedicated service, without singling out for very special mention and honor the name of Senator Margaret Chase Smith, and I am certain that no one here is of a different opinion, for here is a woman who has carved out for herself a niche as one of the most dedicated servants and greatest women in the history of our country.

To give a short resume of her record and her accomplishments would do her a great injustice, but I am just as certain that an itemized accounting of her lifetime achievements would be even more embarrassing to her.

However, I would be very remiss in my duties if I did not recite just some small part of the record of this great woman whom the Daughters of Penelope have selected as the first recipient of our Salute to Women Award.

I should first comment on the fact that the lovely rose has become a symbol and trademark of this charming personality. And if the gentlemen in the audience will forgive me, I cannot help but think, as a woman, that it is a symbol of her status as the sole woman in the Senate—a rose among all those thorns!

A native of Showhegan, Maine (or as we say up North in Massachusetts a Downeaster')

Quote—Republican—end of quote.

A member of the United States House of Representatives from 1940 to 49, and a member of the United States Senate from 1949 to date.

She has broken all records of votes received by candidates in the State of Maine—both percentagewise and in actual numbers.

She is the only woman to have ever been elected to four full terms in the United States Senate.

She is the first woman, at a National Convention of a major political party, to have her name placed in nomination for the office of President of the United States.

She is the only woman to have served in both houses of Congress, and prior to her political career, which began in 1930, when she served on the Republican State Committee of Maine, she was successively a teacher, an executive of a telephone, newspaper and a woolen company and a nationally syndicated columnist.

Her committee service in the House and Senate has been most extensive as witness by that fact that she is now serving on the Appropriations Committee—the Armed Services Committee—the Preparedness Investigations Sub-Committee—and the C.I.A. Sub-Committee.

She has served as a Lt. Col. in the Air Force Reserve. She has been awarded by outstanding and leading colleges and universities throughout the country the grand total of 51 degrees.

She has received awards in almost every category granted to those in public office—but the one which most tellingly points up the sum total of her life was the award which she received in 1967 from the United Press International Poll, as one of the ten most influential women of the World.

Rated as one of America's most effective Ambassadors of Good-Will, and one who has been proposed by many for several years for the Vice-Presidency of the United States, she is truly a most outstanding representative of women in the United States and in the World.

PRESIDENT NIXON'S SMALL BUSINESS PROPOSALS

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to voice my wholehearted support for President Nixon's constructive proposals to help small business.

In this era of bigness, we should never forget that many of the corporate giants today started out as a one-man shop in a leaky garage. But the inventive tinkerers of the past could never have become successful without a favorable business climate, without adequate financing, without favorable tax policies.

It is to help preserve this climate, and help provide needed assistance for small businessmen that the President has recently acted.

I especially want to endorse his recommendations in behalf of minority enterprise.

Minority members make up 15 percent of our population, but they own less than than 3 percent of our businesses. If our free enterprise system is to mean what it says in the way of offering equal opportunity for all, we must redress this imbalance.

One of the President's proposals will help strengthen the program known as MESBIC—Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Company. Under the able direction of Secretary of Commerce Maurice H. Stans this program is being vigorously pushed, and I think it holds tremendous potential to help qualified minority members start their own businesses. The MESBIC program is a joint undertaking between Government and private business to provide venture capital. A private firm sets up a MESBIC with at least $150,000, which is matched two for one by Government. This $450,000 can generate as much as $2 million in loans for new enterprise.

The President has proposed that this be strengthened in two ways: first, by authorizing banks to become involved as a MESBIC sponsor, and second, by providing for ordinary income tax deductions for contributions to MESBIC's operating under nonprofit corporation statutes.

I intend to support these and the other proposals which have been made by the President. I feel it is extremely important for all of us to back the President in his efforts on behalf of the millions of small businessmen of this Nation who need and deserve our assistance.

THE FLEET RESERVE ASSOCIATION—WIDOWS' EQUITY BILL

HON. CHARLES S. GUBSER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, as you know, I was privileged to introduce the widows' equity bill at the request of the Fleet Reserve Association. This legislation, if enacted, would provide the surviving widows of deceased military retirees with the same consideration insofar as an annuity is concerned as is now enjoyed by the widows of civil service employees.

Mr. Speaker, this is a longstanding inequity that Congress should correct.

I am pleased that my efforts and those of the Fleet Reserve Association are beginning to be noticed across the Nation. Mrs. Ted D. Fickes, president of the Retired Officers Wives and Widows Club in Long Beach, Calif., recently wrote a letter to the editor of the Santa Ana Register on this subject which I include in the RECORD at this point:

[From the Santa Ana Register, Feb. 11, 1970]

WIDOWS' PENSION

I would like to inform the service people in your area of a very important piece of legislation now pending in the Armed Services Committee.

Congressman Charles Gubser of California introduced H.R. 6226, the Widows Equity Bill. If passed, this bill would give service widows a pension equal to that of Civil Service widows. The men would pay into it. It is not aid! H.R. 6226 would replace that costly and unsatisfactory thing called the serviceman's family protection plan. Only 15 per cent of the servicemen can afford it. On a depressed salary, the enlisted and low rank find it a hardship, and for the retired people it is prohibitive.

Many men in the service do not realize there are widows who are left without any pension after the death of their husbands, even after 30 years of service!

Readers, please write your congressman and senator to vote for and support H.R. 6226.

Mrs. TED D. FICKES,
President, Retired Officers Wives and Widows.

UNSOLICITED CREDIT CARDS FLOOD NATION

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Life magazine in its current issue contains an article concerning the flooding of the Nation with credit cards—including millions of unsolicited cards.

Because of the implications of this indiscriminate distribution of credit cards, the House Small Business Committee is looking into the matter with respect to the impact of these cards issued by big lending institutions and others on small business.

Because of the interest of my colleagues and the American people in this most important matter, I place the article from Life magazine in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A LITTLE GIFT FROM YOUR FRIENDLY BANKER

(By Paul O'Neil)

American banks have mailed more than 100 million credit cards to unsuspecting citizens of the Republic during the last four years, and have offered each recipient not only a handful of "instant cash" but a dreamy method of buying by signature after the lettuce runs out. One should not conclude that bankers no longer consider money a sacred commodity. They do. They do. But the soberest of trust institutions now suggest that we forget those strictures on thrift with which they belabored us so vigorously in the past and "live better" by refusing to "settle for second best." This means that our friendly banker hopes we will run up credit-card bills we cannot pay off in 25 days and will allow him to charge us EIGHTEEN percent a year on the resultant debt. It does not mean that he trusts us. He will put us on the "hot list" in a flash if we go broke in the process or try to support mistresses at his expense.

We tend to be such 1) slippery, 2) careless or 3) compulsively extravagant louts that bankers have always viewed our attempts to wheedle loans from them with vast suspicion, and have kept the notes by which such transactions are solemnized locked up in fortress-like vaults. The credit-card concept has led them to something very like mailing off hundred-dollar bills to every Tom, Dick and Harry in town, with accompanying notes pledging the receiver to act like a good chap and pay it all back later. They have gamely stifled an instinctive sense of horror in so doing because the cards also present them with an irresistible opportunity for new commercial accounts and the quick, vastly profitable development of widespread consumer credit. Still, some of the effects have been hilarious. In Chicago, during 1966, banks fought each other like jackals to get their cards into the hands of the public only to discover that brigades of thieves, con men and deadbeats were galloping through stores with them and running up disastrous sums in fraudulent or uncollectable debt. And bankers have had to endure incessant complaint at the invasion of privacy inherent in unsolicited distribution, the most vehement of it from innocents discovering—on receipt of bills for mysterious purchases—that cards bearing their names had been waylaid, forged and misused without ever reaching them.

Credit cards, and particularly bank cards, have inspired new and enduring types of white-collar crime, have attracted the beady attention of the Mafia, and have revealed a fascinating capacity for dishonesty in employes of the postal system, who steal them from the mails and sell them for prices up to $50. Their vulnerability to theft while being manufactured, embossed and transported in bulk suggests the possibility of even more spectacular crime in the future; so does the possibility that some larcenous-minded electronics expert might jam up the big computers which record and assess the credit buying they inspire. One of the banks' fondest selling points—that the cards are devices which "simplify" life—is the subject of ironic controversion: insurance companies insist on offering policies to protect the citizen against lawsuits if his cards are lost or stolen. Legislators, meanwhile, view the proliferation of cards with increasing alarm and offer bills to restrict the presumptuousness, even insolence, with which banks utilize the mails in recruiting converts.

But bank cards are here to stay. At least 20 million of the people on whom they have thus far been dumped seem absolutely delighted with them. Most of these enthusiasts are proving perfectly capable, moreover, of maintaining a steady if sometimes precarious balance between improvidence and solvency while using them. Seventy-eight percent of these users are even more obliging; they not only "roll their credit"—by paying off less than they owe each month and thus staying in debt for indeterminate periods—but show no slightest restiveness at the "small service charge of one and one half percent a month" this privilege costs them.

An enormous number of people have thrown their cards into the garbage can, of course, or have cut them up and mailed the pieces back with ill-tempered instructions as to methods of eventual disposal. New York's indignant Democratic Congressman Jonathan B. Bingham has gone further: he has been able to register his objections to plastic credit on the floor of the House of Representatives. These began when Boston's State Street Bank and Trust Company sent him an unsolicited BankAmericard last winter with "my name slightly misspelled." He sent it back with an "angry note." The bank answered with statement of credit-card indebtedness: a bill for a "$10.79 purchase my wife had made by mail from S. S. Pierce Co.—and which she had already paid by check." He dashed off another angry note. "What naiveté," he cried later, on the floor. "The computer was completely unimpressed." He just got another statement, this one with 16¢ in interest added and a "sharp reminder" of his financial delinquency. "I feel," he has told his fellow legislators, "like a character in a Kafka novel!"

But such soreheads—even if they are soreheads who have been elected to high office—do not count. The average man, his senses dulled by an endless reception of junk mail, simply chucks his card into a desk or cupboard or dresser drawer if he is among those who are not instantly galvanized by their bank's sudden new interest in their well-being. He may eventually betray reactions characteristic of the sorehead group: when the bank sends him a follow-up statement (which shows no charges but is simply intended to goad him into revealing whether he still has his card), he may poke holes in it or punch it full of staples and send it back to confuse the bank's computer. But as long as the card stays in his dresser he is subject, though he is not aware of it, to a curious and enduring sort of subconscious temptation. Bank records indicate he will eventually dig it out and give it a try and will thereafter tend to use it again . . . and again . . .

Banks themselves, meanwhile, have hacked away a good deal of the naiveté inefficiency and confusion which hampered their early efforts to invent and play the new credit game. They have largely abandoned their efforts to go it alone while doing so. Nothing so suggests that the bank card is now a permanent and significant part of American life—and an instrument of social as well as financial change—as the fact that banks have now aligned themselves into the same pattern of dual national organization which has produced Republicans and Democrats, the A.F.L. and the C.I.O. and all those National and American Leagues into which professional sport has so unerringly divided itself. The overwhelming majority of banks now involved in, or just entering, the credit-card business utilize one of two national licensing systems: Bank Americard (developed locally and over a long period of time by California's Bank of America) and the Master Charge card (which competing San Francisco banks hurriedly conceived in 1967 as a response to it).

Promoters of the belated Master Charge card have been forced to play "catch up," as they say in football, and have displayed a certain tendency to fumble and throw long on first down. They have exerted themselves mightily, nevertheless, and both systems are now racing along almost exactly neck and neck. Each card is presently being issued by more than 3,000 banks.

Each system claims slightly more than 20 million "holders." Federal Reserve economists estimate that half of them—10 million possessors of BankAmericards and another 10 million owners of Master Charge cards—use their credit accounts actively and maintain an average indebtedness of $185 apiece. The remaining 20 million members of plastic society have yet to use their cards but still have not, to the banks' best knowledge, tied them to the legs of carrier pigeons, scuffed them up by forcing locks with them, or otherwise abandoned, destroyed or mutilated them.

These overall figures make it dramatically plain that American banks have hoisted themselves, almost overnight, into a position of strategic dominance in the credit-card business. The grand total of all other such credit symbols—oil company cards, restaurant cards, "travel and entertainment" cards and department store charge plates—still exceeds the total of all bank cards, but no single competing company comes close to matching either Bank Americard or Master Charge. The bank card's rate of growth, moreover, is still dizzying; the number of issuing banks has increased nationally by 68% in the last 12 months.

Bank cards still encounter areas of resistance. Most big department stores refuse to honor them since these institutions use their own credit lists to push merchandise by mail and have no impulse to surrender this means of communicating with their customers. Restaurants in many places will have no part of them. They do not yet threaten the three established "travel and entertainment" cards—American Express, Diners' Club and Carte Blanche, which charge a $15.00 annual fee, spurn applicants making less than $7,500 a year unless they have lots of money in the bank, and grant unlimited credit on a 30-to-60-day interest-free basis. But Master Charge and BankAmericard are already so pervasive (the first good in 49 states, the second in 44 and both honored in dozens of foreign countries) and so broadly usable (almost 600,000 retail outlets ranging from pet shops to airlines) that it is difficult not to think they will wipe out most other cards in the long run. Both bank systems tirelessly seek new uses for plastic; holders in 10 different states where banks have made the proper arrangements can now use them in paying up to $500 worth of federal income taxes.

The bank card is still in a state of fiduciary adolescence, but it has already experienced several distinct evolutionary phases—the last, and most stable, of which can be said to have begun last year when four of the biggest New York banks and three lesser ones finally got into the franchised card game. These moratory giants gave plastic credit the sort of ultimate endorsement which, say, pot might achieve if Fifth Avenue dowagers began smoking it in the Oak Room at the Plaza.

It has taken two decades of experimentation to bring the big card game (initially conceived in New York in 1951) to this degree of sophistication. California's Bank of America, which seized upon the idea in 1961, was first to start it toward fruition. As it became apparent that the boys in California were dredging something comparable to the riffle at Sutter's Mill, colleagues all over the country began to catch the prospecting fever too, to shed their trepidation at the public's lamentable tendencies toward insolvency and, one by one, to try panning all those faceless folks out thar beyond the bank for traces of dust which had not yet been paid out for the mortgage, the car and the grocer. The charge card promised to be an instrument which could extract pay dirt from several types of gravel—the banks asked merchants for discounts or kickbacks of from 1% to 6½% on all card credit transactions (in return for which they guaranteed the stores immediate cash for the goods involved in such sales) and, by assuming the job of long-term bill collecting themselves, stood ready to make another 18% per annum on customer indebtedness which endured longer than 25 days. And since a merchant had to open an account to get his dough every day, the card-issuing bank was also presented with a kind of secondary opportunity, a chance to snatch all his other commercial business from some less adventurous competitor.

During the early years of the great plastic rush, however, most of these visions proved to be mirages—and mirages, worse yet, which hid all sorts of quicksand, loco weed and rattlenake nests. Bankers setting out to play the new credit game were involved, almost instantly, in a sort of interlocking dilemma: they could not ask the public to use their cards if no merchants would honor them, and could not ask a merchant for acceptance and discounts without being able to suggest that an army of buyers was gathering outside his showroom windows. They were usually forced, thus, to launch both processes at once—and had to be fast, fast, fast in "getting their plastic on the air" (creditese for card distribution) so that gangs of salesmen could hurry to the task of reciting mailing statistics and hauling tradesmen into the fold. They did so, in many cases, with a kind of eager innocence which none of them would have countenanced for a moment in firms with which they did business; a few of them, caught up in the excitement of the unfamiliar chase, seem to have become as blithely careless of consequences as a drunken sailor shooting craps in a Mexican whorehouse on New Year's Eve.

Some families got six or seven cards from one Chicago bank just before the holiday buying season of 1966 and were occasionally puzzled to discover that the plastic was embossed in the names of infant children. Endless thousands of cards have gone astray in every big city—at times as many as 10% of those put into the mails—because metropolitan cliff dwellers move so continuously. They have been mailed off to unemployables, drunks, narcotics addicts and to compulsive debtors, a process President Johnson's Special Assistant Betty Furness found very like "giving sugar to diabetics."

A study of 84 representative card operations which San Jose Attorney Richard N. Salle and Economist Constantine Danellis conducted last year for the Charge Account Bankers Association showed that only a fifth of the banks investigated checked the credit background of those to whom cards were mailed. Only a third required some minimum balance when sending cards to their own customers. Thirty percent used mailing lists of people with whom the bank had no experience at all, and the citizen who actually came forward and requested a card was welcomed with open arms between 50% and 75% of the time—a fifth of the banks did not even bother to find out if he had a job.

Since bankers try to stay as far as possible from the purlieus of venality, they should doubtless be forgiven for failing to anticipate some of the excited skulduggery they triggered with their mass mailing campaigns. Few if any of them realized that every big city has specialized thieves who prowl apartment house mailboxes on the first of every month looking for relief checks. By sending credit cards out on the first, too, they automatically introduced hundreds of light-fingered parasites to a new and heady means of sustenance. Banks seldom stopped to consider the folly of mailing vast heaps of cards on Friday, thus immobilizing them in substations or post offices over the weekend and all but inviting clerks with low moral thresholds (and correspondingly low salaries) to adopt a few of them at their leisure. Least of all did the new plastic entrepreneurs anticipate the hundreds of small store operators who have formed alliances with possessors of forged, stolen cards, "sold" them hundreds of dollars' worth of fictitious goods, and blithely billed the bank for the resultant nontransactions.

Neither the Department of Justice nor the FBI will make any estimate of the number of bank-card frauds in recent years. Chief Postal Inspector William J. Cotter, while admitting to 80 arrests of postal employes last year and a 700% increase in the last four years in time spent on credit-card investigation by his department, likes to blame the trouble on "long-haired musicians who use stolen cards in one town today and another tomorrow." People who would never steal property or forge a check will run up bills on a stray credit card. The letter carrier who finds himself returning unwanted cards to the bank, the garbage man who discovers discards in the rubbish, the resident of a boarding house who finds one misaddressed on the hall table or the slum housewife who gets one in the mail, all tend to feel fate has sent them a handy little present. So many have been lost, stolen or have gone astray during big orgies of distribution that the smart cheater has been able to use one for a few hours or a few days, throw it away and start using another with only the remotest risk of being caught. If you know the right people in New York today you can buy a validly stamped but unsigned driver's license for $150, forge it, and thus furnish spurious proof of identity if questioned about a forged bank card.

Sixteen retailers, three gas station operators, a postal employe and ten co-conspirators have recently been indicted by a federal grand jury in Chicago—but not before two and a half years of untrammeled larceny in which they did five banks out of "millions of dollars." Brooklyn District Attorney Eugene Gold rails at "helter-skelter card distribution" and, like many another prosecutor, feels he is being called upon to sweep up mistakes the banks could have avoided with care and foresight. Credit-card fraud has become Brooklyn's leading "white-collar crime," and Gold's office handles 20 complaints which stem from it and institutes one new criminal prosecution involving it every day.

The banks have gone to a great deal of trouble to soothe the misgivings which criminal misuse raises in the breasts of prospective holders and to assure them that they will not be liable for debts incurred after loss or theft—IF (ah, dulcet phrase) they report the incident within 24 hours. There is nothing in the fine print, however, about the fellow who may not miss his plastic for a week or 10 days after it has fallen into the hands of some rascal. This is doubtless wise. The average bank will launch itself after such an unfortunate like a grizzly charging a rabbit if it decides he has been "negligent," and could hardly improve its image by publicizing the ominous fiduciary snuffling and the squeaks of horror and dismay which characterize these undignified little episodes. There is nothing unique, for instance, about the methods with which New York's First National City Bank is attempting to extract dough from a hapless Brooklyn bug exterminator, Daniel Orlick.

Orlick and his wife Gloria were not only delighted but flattered when First National City invited them to sign up for one of its credit cards last year—a fellow in insect eradication does not make much money or hear much applause as he practices his specialty, and both felt a sense of improved status when they were embraced by plastic society. But Orlick, alas, seldom actually used his card and had no idea how long it had been missing when he duly wrote the bank, last April 16, to say he had lost it.

He was not only horrified but astonished (since the card had a credit limit of $400) to receive a statement for $558.82 by return mail. Another statement quickly followed, this time for $1,137.06. Gloria telephoned the bank in agitation to say 1) that her husband had reported the loss, 2) to ask how a crook could evade the $400 limit and 3) to protest that the Orlicks didn't have $1,137.06 to pay for anything, least of all some nogoodnik's illegal pursuit of la dolce vita. "Nobody at the bank seemed to know what was going on," she says. "I had an awful time just getting somebody who would talk to me. And when they finally switched me to a man in the collections department he was terribly cold and nasty . . . he just told me to get the money and said he didn't care how we did it."

Statement, meanwhile, followed statement—the last of them for $1,636.02. One of them listed the license number of a car for which Orlick's personal crook had bought gasoline. "I thought I'd hit gold," cries Gloria. "I called the cops. I called the bank's security department. But they both told me it had been a rented car or something." Rented car or not, the Orlicks stubbornly went on refusing to pay, and First National City, having failed to squeeze the crook's total expenditures out of them, now calculates that his spending amounted to no more than $963.98 at the time Orlick reported the loss of his card. The bank is presently hacking at them through the offices of a lawyer, who has added legal fees to the $963.98 which bring it up to $1,156.76 and has hauled them into court to attempt to collect it. The Orlicks have consulted a lawyer, too. "He tells us to settle," says Gloria, "since he won't defend us for less than $500. We dont' know what to do. Right now we're living with it, y'know?"

Plastic society will doubtless go on producing similar vicitims, since its members will inevitably go on losing their status symbols, too, but bank-card fraud is nevertheless being reduced in many sections of the country. Progressive banks check the credit of prospective holders with increasing diligence, and have hit on simple but effective means of tightening up their mailing techniques. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company of New York, for instance, now hides its cards in pieces of paperboard to prevent their being "felt" by mail handlers, encloses these "carriers" in plain envelopes of varying colors, sorts the envelopes into batches intended for specific neighborhoods, and delivers each batch to its particular substation in mailbags which remain sealed until turned over to letter carriers. Unsolicited mass mailing itself, meanwhile, has largely served its purpose and is dwindling away; banks which have utilized it to recruit their basic cadres of users are abandoning it to court volunteer applicants by more selective means, and are inventing methods (free bottles of wine for those who pay restaurants with credit cards rather than vulgar cash) of "activating" all that old but virgin plastic lying around, unused, in the cupboards of stubborn, debt-shy and unspeakably old-fashioned burglars.

There are those who believe the credit card is provoking a revolution in banking as profound as that which ensued after London's goldsmiths began issuing notes rather than actual cash during the 17th Century, and that the arrogance, haste and confusion attendant on its introduction must be accepted, even forgiven, as by-products of inevitable and salutary change. Whatever the validity of this view, one must guess that plastic credit is equally significant as a social phenomenon and, salutary or not, will influence the values and living habits of the average man at least as dramatically as it influences the techniques of the counting-house. Millions of card users, for instance, are already the creatures of big, third-generation computers, machines which provide the real key to successful card systems since they eliminate paper work and can oversee and monitor the financial condition and buying habits of enormous masses of people.

Both BankAmericard and Master Charge banks have banded into regional "interchange" associations which finance and operate this electronic hardware on a communal basis. The Master Charge groups alone, for instance, maintain 13 central computer centers in the U.S., the biggest and most fascinating of them in an industrial park at Long Island's Lake Success. The Long Island plant now represents 220 banks in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Florida, Wisconsin and Delaware. Its gleaming, white-brick building houses complex machinery which "captures" data from an endless flow of sales slips, and two IBM 360–50 computers which not only store the resultant torrent of information, but can vomit back status reports on any of two million cards in the twinkling of an eye.

How deeply has a card user eaten into his $200 or $400 credit limit? The computer knows. Has a card been used to make "suspicious" purchases—three sports jackets in one day, say, or seven automobile tires? The computer will express a kind of electronic anxiety when it is next asked for comment. Eastern Master Charge merchants, 30,000 of whom now operate under the jurisdiction of the Long Island installation, must dial a telephone code number and communicate with the computer before charging any item of $50 or more. Rows of girls, who wear telephonic headsets and spend their days facing television screens at the center, act as intermediaries in this process; the merchant reads his customer's Master Charge number over the telephone, the girl punches it on a numerical keyboard, and the screen instantly reveals the condition of the card account in question. The Lake Success plant maintains its own private police—a knot of poker-faced ex-cops in vaguely unnatural sports jackets—who cut in on the line if the computer announces that a card has been lost, stolen or has been misused, and tell the merchant to grab the plastic if he can do so without bodily harm and attempt to detain the customer while they alert the local cops.

All this screening—and the fact that banks themselves are assembling larger and larger "security" forces which investigate fraud and turn their evidence over to the police—is gradually bringing misuse under control. There are still gaps in these chevaux-de-frise: the advent of the bank cards usuable anywhere in the country or in Europe has offered the credit crook something of the same opportunity zone defenses offer the pass receiver in football: if he moves fast enough from one computer area to the next while entertaining blondes and running up hotel bills, he can very probably stay a jump ahead of the law for a long time. And the card associations nervously anticipate bigger crime. The embossing machines which imprint names and numbers on plastics blanks at Lake Success are installed in a glasswalled room. The women who run them must lock up their coats and handbags on reporting to work and endure the constant scrutiny of guards while on shift. Both blanks and finished cards are taken in and out of the industrial park in armored cars.

But if credit-card crime can be expected to go on providing the kind of headlines bankers deplore, it is far less important than the antidotes it inspires. The controls and communications systems which are being developed to make plastic credit fraud-free and efficient also involve the ordinary card user and will do so more dramatically in the future. The bank card is an imperfect medium of exchange at the moment because nobody can be absolutely certain that it, unlike the impersonal $20 bill, is always backed by real buying power. If a seller could make sure a credit-card buyer is who he says he is on every occasion and could discover whether he has enough cash in his account to pay for his purchase, this difficulty could be eliminated. Bank associations, thus, are pressing for means of achieving "instant communication and instant credit verification."

IBM and TRW, Inc., are currently engaged, for instance, in the development of an experimental system known as Omniswitch. Banking alliances such as the eastern Master Charge institutions, which have commissioned this particular work, hope in the end to achieve computers which can not only be reached, automatically, from any telephone in the country, but which will recite the state of the customer's account in clear English ("audio-response") and, on being instructed by a few taps of a touch-tone button, will deduct the price of his purchase at the very moment he makes it.

It would be hard to guess just how completely Americans might embrace the sort of social implications such a system could inspire—although millions have already cast a vote for some of them by signing their present cards and millions more will doubtless follow suit. The credit card is inflationary (merchants must be expected to ooch prices a bit to compensate for their kickbacks to the banks), even though it is responsible for only 2% of today's $98.2 billion on consumer debt. It is expensive, at least for the majority which pays 1.5% a month on its bills. It can still lead to hideous embarrassments if lost. But it remains, in its curious way, a status symbol; most banks refer to it as a "charge" card rather than a credit card, since they have discovered that a vast segment of the middle class believes debt is sinful but charging is chic. More fascinating yet, it seems to be a kind of key to dreams. Bank-card advertising, like those airline commercials which call upon us to drop everything and take fly-now-pay-later flights to Hawaii or, God save us all, Zurich, subtly suggest that actual money is not really involved.

There is a possibility, thus, that credit cards could become a major medium of exchange and that the future American could end up with just one of them as his means of paying for almost everything—his house and car as well as his suits and lunches. The one-card man would be called upon to tell his bank's computer more about his life, times, financial condition and fondness for drink or drugs than many of us might like to confess today, but he might be privy to delights which we are denied. Take lifetime credit for newly married couples, calculated on an actuarial basis from estimates of total potential earnings and expenses. Such couples could get a kind of emotional bonus, too—at least according to New York Marketing Consultant Lawrence G. Chait: "Their credit man would become their family counselor."

And a one-card world might just provide realization, at last, of that splendid concept, the Universal Number. One would be privileged, if so, to possess a personal number from the cradle to the grave: it would be printed on one's baby bracelet, stamped on one's schoolbooks, utilized as one's lifetime license number and as one's serial number in the service—and, of course, embossed on one's all-time credit card. Those who pine for a simplistic and revelatory society will be comforted to know that a committee of the American Bankers Association is aware of the opportunity and is considering the added efficiency it could bring to plastic credit.

A REASONABLE BILL

HON. LIONEL VAN DEERLIN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. VAN DEERLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation designed to relieve an inequity in the Communications Act. My bill would amend the act to exempt certain categories of commercial fishing vessels from existing equipment and operator requirements.

I am convinced that an injustice was committed when fishing vessels were subjected to the same standards as cargo boats by 1965 amendments to the act.

As most of our colleagues know, the domestic fishing industry has been losing ground to foreign competitors thrust forward by the helpful policies of their own governments.

To comply with the 1965 requirements will impose serious additional hardship on our already hard-pressed fishermen. I am told that costs of the necessary modifications will average about $1,000 in smaller vessels, and that the requirement that fishing boats displacing 1,600 gross tons or more carry a radio telegraph station and operator has effectively ruled out these larger, more efficient vessels for our own fishermen.

International conventions, to which the United States subscribes, have clearly differentiated between cargo and fishing boats in setting forth standards for radios and other communications gear.

Our own fishermen should not be hobbled by unduly stringent requirements that are not imposed on their foreign rivals.

SOUTH CAROLINA POSTAL EMPLOYEES ARE ON THE JOB

HON. ALBERT W. WATSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, it now appears that the mammoth postal strike which for the past few days has literally paralyzed many of our major urban areas, has subsided to the extent that we can now look back on this national crisis and make some observations.

Without question, the postal employees have some justifiable grievances, no less of which is salary, especially in view of the substantial increases given in many of the higher echelons of Federal employment, which includes the Congress. Of course I introduced a resolution to disapprove the congressional increase in the light of the serious financial situation; nevertheless, many postal employees look upon this as justification for immediate action in meeting their salary demands.

Since I first came to Congress in 1962, I have argued consistently that our postal workers are not receiving adequate compensation. I have introduced and supported legislation over the years to correct this inequity and I will certainly continue to do so. The day should have long ago passed when our postal or any other Federal employee had to moonlight in order to support his family.

If there was ever a time to commend our loyal, dedicated, and patriotic postal workers who, day in and day out, fair or foul weather, are on the job, it is right now. Now I am not talking about those who abandoned their responsibilities to the people, whom they are sworn to serve, and walked off their jobs several days ago. When one considers the totality of the situation, the strikers only constituted a fraction of American postal employees. Despite incredible pressure, the great majority of employees stood fast and made certain that the mails were not interrupted. In this connection, I want to commend, in the highest fashion, post office employees in my State of South Carolina. I know of no group more dedicated and devoted to the public than postal workers in South Carolina.

In every town and city in our State which has a post office, they are considered pillars of the community. Oftentimes in our smaller cities, the post office is the only Federal installation and for many people this is the only physical contact that they will have with the Federal Government. With very few exceptions, in South Carolina, the post office workers are ambassadors of good will for the Government. The events of the past few days have served as a symbolic reminder of their faithfulness to the public trust. Rather than defy the law, post office employees in South Carolina were on the job as usual.

I feel confident that Congress will enact a meaningful postal pay raise bill this year, but Congress cannot legislate under a threat by a small minority of workers who participate in an illegal work stoppage. Last year I supported H.R. 13000, the Federal Salary Comparability Act of 1969. The object of this bill is to keep Federal wage scales comparable to those in private industry as well as include a pay raise for most postal workers and reducing from 21 to 8 years the time required to reach top postal pay levels. I believe that we must enact this legislation in behalf of our loyal postal workers. While we deplore the irresponsible strike of the few, let us not forget the responsible actions of the overwhelming majority.

KANSANS LIKE "SESAME STREET"

HON. GARNER E. SHRIVER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. SHRIVER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most exciting new programs for children is a half-hour presentation called "Sesame Street" which is produced by the Children's Television Workshop and supported by the U.S. Office of Education. It is aimed at the Nation's 12 million preschool children and constitutes a major breakthrough and promises for the first time to plant the seeds of learning in young minds before they reach school through television.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Kansas Teacher, official publication of the Kansas State Teachers' Association, which illustrates the enthusiastic reaction to "Sesame Street" in Kansas. The article follows:

KANSANS LIKE "SESAME STREET"

100 percent raves.

That's how Mrs. Dorothy Stafford, television curriculum specialist for KTWU in Topeka, describes the letters and telephone calls thanking the station for "Sesame Street," the National ETV show for preschoolers.

"We get thank-you's every day from both children and adults," she said, adding the only criticism has been from parents asking if the show could be changed to the afternoons or repeated on Saturdays.

A telephone call from a Topeka mother is typical. She said "My son has just sat still in front of the television for an hour. That's the first time he's ever done that."

Mrs. Stafford's mail shows that critics come in all ages and sizes. One four-year-old girl writes "I like 'Sesame Street' a lot but once you called a whale a fish. A whale is not a fish."

Another child's letter had the number "2" on a page. His mother's note of explanation: "My two-year-old has just made his first '2' while watching 'Sesame Street.' It's such a relief to know this show requires no monitoring."

"Sesame Street" is successfully competing according to an Abilene mother. She writes: "Our three-year-old son knows that when the 'Lucy Show' comes on it's time for 'Sesame Street' and he changes stations."

Variety magazine reports that Nielson ratings for the first week in December show that between five and six million children watch the show each day. This represents about half of the nation's preschoolers.

In a recent memo to the stations carrying

"Sesame Street," Joan Cooney, executive director of the Children's Television Workshop (CTW), says plans are being made to continue the show next fall.

CTW produces the show, partially supported by the U.S. Office of Education. CTW and USOE are studying the show's audience and its educational effects. Results will be available this spring.

AIR POLLUTION

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the March 26 issue of the Wall Street Journal carried an informative article written by Mr. John V. Conti on the efforts of private citizens and State authorities to control and eliminate air pollution through our judicial system.

The article notes that the judiciary of this country is being given an opportunity to join the legislative and executive branches in recognizing the danger inherent in man's misuse of the environment. Therefore, I include the text of this article at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CLEANING UP IN COURTS: CONSERVATIONISTS PRESS SUITS TO ASSERT RIGHT TO A CLEAN ENVIRONMENT—PHOENIX ACTION SAYS SMOKE DAMAGES NATURAL BEAUTY; ILLINOIS TACKLES AIRLINES—INDUSTRY FEARS THE COSTS

(By John V. Conti)

Do you have a legal right to fresh air?

A growing number of conservation groups and governmental agencies contend that you do—and that you likewise are legally entitled to clean waterways, clear blue skies and surroundings where a reasonable number of scenic wonders and breeding grounds for wildlife are left undisturbed. They contend, moreover, that it doesn't take a special law to guarantee your right to these things—they're simply yours.

That may sound like a novel idea, but it's inspiring a broad legal attack in courts across the nation against all sorts of degradation of the environment. Scores of lawsuits have been filed recently by conservation organizations, irate individuals and public officials determined to establish the right of everybody to pollution-free surroundings. Many suits contend that ordinary legal concepts of nuisance and negligence should be expanded to protect the environmental rights of the citizen, while others argue that such rights are protected by the Constitution.

RESTRICTED VISIBILITY

In Phoenix, for example, two university professors and their wives are seeking $2 billion in damages from six copper companies that operate nearly all the copper smelters in Arizona. The suit charges that smoke from the smelters not only is injurious to health but also restricts visibility and "damages the natural beauty of the environment." The plaintiffs are asking that the damages be divided among the 700,000 residents of the Salt River Valley, which encompasses Phoenix.

In Alexandria, Va., a citizens association and two conservation groups have filed suit to block an apartment development that would require filling about nine acres of the Hunting Creek Estuary, one of a number of estuaries that shelter wildlife along the Potomac River. The suit, brought on Constitutional grounds, contends that the development would damage a valuable natural resource of the people.

The Justice Department recently filed a civil suit against Florida Power & Light Co., charging that the utility is creating thermal pollution of Biscayne Bay with heated water discharged by two of its power plants. Contending that the thermal pollution is "rapidly ruining marine life," the suit asks a court order requiring the company to set up and adhere to a schedule for ending the pollution.

There's ample evidence that the suits filed so far are just a start. The battle is increasingly taking on the character of a well-organized campaign coordinated by various environmentalist groups.

NEWS OF LITIGATION

The Conservation Foundation, a Washington-based research and information group, plans to start publishing an environmental law "reporter" this summer to bring details of significant pollution litigation to lawyers. The American Trial Lawyers Association recently formed an environmental law committee, and it has held seminars on environmental suits for lawyers, scientists, law students and others.

Just last weekend a group known as the Natural Resources Defense Council Inc. was formed at a meeting in Princeton, N.J. Modeled after the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, the group plans to bring pollution suits and to help others do so just as the fund has done in civil rights cases. The group's organizers are a number of New York attorneys, including Wall Street lawyer Stephen Duggan.

The defendants in environmental suits are nearly always corporations, and the specter of an explosion of such litigation has confronted U.S. industry with a huge potential for damage liability. Corporate executives also are worried about the delay and disruption of planned expansions that are challenged by environmentalists.

The potential cost to industry in existing claims is already sizable. "The amount in litigation over the country is staggering," says Frank L. Seamans, a Pittsburgh lawyer who has defended such companies as U.S. Steel, Aluminum Co. of America, Sun Oil Corp. and Monsanto Chemical Co. against pollution damage suits.

One suit, filed in Federal court in New York on behalf of "all the people of the United States" including "generations yet unborn," demands a colossal $30 billion in damages from eight producers of DDT for punishment and restitution of damage allegedly done to the environment by the pesticide. The suit was filed by Carol A. Yannacone of Patchogue, N.Y., wife of a lawyer who has been active in environmental causes.

BILLIONS FOR SMOG

Another potentially huge claim was filed by the state of California earlier this month against the four major auto makers and the Automobile Manufacturers Association. Charging that the companies and the trade associations conspired to halt development of auto smog-control devices, the suit asks redress for damages caused in the state by auto exhaust pollution. The amount is unspecified, but state officials say it could run into billions of dollars.

Most companies that have been named as defendants in environmental suits are reluctant to discuss the details of the cases. But a spokesman for U.S. Steel, which has been involved in a number of cases, says, "We take all these suits very seriously."

Many of those filing pollution suits say they are doing so because they feel anti-pollution laws and those who enforce them simply don't do an adequate job. "If there's a theme to all these suits, it's an attempt to circumvent relatively ineffective regulatory agencies," says Joseph L. Sax, a University of Michigan law professor who is writing a book on environmental law.

In Illinois, under a controversial new law, state Attorney General William J. Scott can bring civil action on his own against any polluter, whether or not the matter is being considered by any other state agency.

"We saw that all the discourse relating to pollution was between industry and the boards of enforcement, which were more or less dominated by industry-oriented people. The public, which was being polluted, was never part of the discussion," says Allen A. Freeman, deputy attorney general. "So we developed the concept that the attorney general is the lawyer for the people and therefore wil bring lawsuits on behalf of the people in the field of pollution."

Among the results is a suit filed just Tuesday against the city of Chicago, charging the city with illegal dumping and open burning of refuse at O'Hare Field. The suit alleges the burning causes air pollution and hampers the visibility of airlines pilots when landing. It asks a permanent injunction to prevent the city from continuing the dumping and burning.

The attorney general's office also has filed suit against 23 airlines that use the airport, seeking to force them to install new pollution-control devices on all aircraft engines. Other suits seek court-enforced timetables that would force U.S. Steel and Republic Steel to clean up discharges by their plants into Lake Michigan and the Calumet River. Mr. Scott also has filed an antitrust suit against the four major auto makers, alleging a conspiracy to avoid installation of smog-control devices on cars.

To be sure, the criminal laws pertaining to pollution aren't being entirely ignored. In recent weeks, the Federal Government has filed criminal suits against Olin Corp., Procter & Gamble Co., International Harvester Co., and others, charging them with polluting Chicago-area waterways. New Jersey's Department of Health is pushing a program against industrial pollution that has resulted in 140 complaints and $140,000 in court-ordered penalties.

At this point, no one knows what the results of most civil pollution suits will be. "Very few of these matters are beyond the pleading stage," says James Jeans, a professor at the University of Missouri law school who is chairman of the American Trial Lawyers Association's environmental law committee.

But, emboldened by a few early successes, environmentalists feel they stand a good chance of expanding the established legal concepts of nuisance or negligence to cover environmental questions.

Such legal concepts traditionally have been tied closely to property rights. "Until recently you didn't have a damage claim except for physically demonstrable damage, such as if your cow died or your tree died" as a result of pollution, says Pittsburgh lawyer Seamans.

But now environmental litigants are seeking both to prove harm that is other than economic and to assert rights less tangible than property rights. This has raised a question known to lawyers as "standing" to sue—or the ability to prove that you have a right to bring your problems before a court.

MORE LIBERAL CONCEPT

In the past, if a man couldn't show any direct personal economic harm, courts tended to throw his claim out on grounds that he didn't have any standing in the case. But in recent years the courts have become far more liberal in their concept of standing, permitting persons to come before the court as members of the public alleging damage to the public interest.

One of the most important decisions on the question of standing occurred in what is probably, in terms of legal precedent, the most important environmental case argued so far—the battle of conservationists to prevent construction of a power plant at Storm King Mountain in the Hudson River in New York. The conservationists succeeded in getting standing in court to challenge the Federal Power Commission's approval of Consolidated Edison Co.'s plans to build the plant. (At the moment, after years of litigation, the case is back before the FPC under a Federal court order requiring the FPC to reconsider its approval of the plant, taking environmental factors into account.)

The Storm King case established that conservationists do have standing to argue against planned projects that they contend would harm the environment.

Once in court, of course, environmentalists still must prove damage to the environment is occurring. "The courts want something a little more definite than people coming in and saying the sky isn't as blue as it used to be, or that the fumes are aggravating their sinuses," says Roderick A. Cameron, executive director of the Environmental Defense Fund, a Long Island-based coalition of lawyers and scientists.

INTANGIBLE INTERESTS

Still, he notes, "the courts are now a little more inclined to move in the direction of protecting these intangible interests."

One of the problems faced by environmental groups is coming up with the technical data to prove that pollution exists and to show its effects. To help with technical problems, Mr. Cameron's Environmental Defense Fund has put together a committee of about 300 scientists who are willing to lend their expertise and testify in environmental cases. "We're acquiring a stable of expert witnesses," says Mr. Cameron, who, at 31, is himself both a lawyer and an engineer.

The fund also plans a program of mock trials at universities, using law students as lawyers and faculty members as expert witnesses so that all those involved will get some experience with pollution litigation. "Scientists are a little leery of getting involved in litigation, but once they get their feet wet they're a little less so," Mr. Cameron says.

MINORITY ENTERPRISES

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, minorities represent about 15 percent of our country's population, but only 2.9 percent of America's businesses. Efforts are being made, however, to bring these figures into equilibrium so that the minorities of America will be better able to participate as owners and employers in our free enterprise system. One of the leading agencies behind this drive has been OMBE—the Office of Minority Business Enterprise—U.S. Department of Commerce.

My understanding of OMBE and its programs has been broadened, thanks to some welcome assistance. A brief but concise outline of the program has been prepared by a Dominguez State College student from my 17th California District, Wilhelm "Bill" Pickens. His outline is based on information gathered at an OMBE meeting held on February 12, 1970, in Los Angeles and from the study of publications dealing with Federal assistance programs for minority business enterprises.

I have found the outline an excellent ready reference and information source and believe it may be of interest to some of my colleagues. So that others will be able to take advantage of Mr. Pickens' outline, I submit it for the RECORD:

THE CONSTITUTION—NEED AND FULFILLMENT

HON. GLENN R. DAVIS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion national speech contest, on the subject of the Constitution, is an excellent experience for youths—boys and girls—of high school age. The contestants give a 10-minute prepared speech, and then give a 5-minute presentation after 5 minutes of preparation, on a Constitution-related subject drawn out of a hat.

This year's Virginia State winner was James "Mac" Davis, a senior at Wakefield High School in Arlington County. On April 6, he will compete against several other State winners at Rocky Mount, N.C. His prepared speech, submitted here for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is entitled "The Constitution—Need and Fulfillment."

"Mac," incidentally, is my son. His speech follows:

THE CONSTITUTION—NEED AND FULFILLMENT

(By James "Mac" Davis)

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

This is my introduction. It is also the introduction to the Constitution of our Nation as it was written 183 years ago. The Preamble sets forth the purpose and aim of the document it introduces. It also reflects the pressing need of the time for that document.

Cornwallis' surrender at Yorktown ended the Revolutionary War for all practical purposes. Thereafter, a period of instability in finance and politics settled upon the fledgling, newly independent states along the Atlantic Coast. Each individual state considered itself sovereign, and each selfishly guarded its affirmed right to govern itself. In fact, these thirteen individual states regarded each other with open jealousy. Several highly inflated and unstable currencies sprang up, including the continentals issued by the Continental Congress; pieces of paper so worthless that even today we hear the adage "not worth a continental." States raised tariff barriers against each other. State legislatures, which had assumed Revolutionary War debts, refused to pay them. Private credit was destroyed by irresponsible acts allowing debtors to escape payment of their obligations. Great Britain refused to reopen vital trade channels between the British Commonwealth and the American states, and British troops continued to occupy what was then known as the Northwest territory. On two occasions armed conflict over boundary disputes erupted between adjoining states. In Massachusetts Captain Daniel Sharp led thousands of armed farmers in a march on the State Capital at Boston.

This unrest was manifested in a petition circulated among the officers of the Continental Armies by a Colonel Nicola. The petition asked George Washington to become a military-supported dictator. Although General Washington vigorously refused, he and other patriots were apprised of the seriousness and depth of the economic and political crisis which confronted America; thus he joined with Madison, Hamilton, Franklin, and others in supporting the calls for a Constitutional convention.

These were the turbulent background years which brought the delegates of the thirteen states together at Philadelphia in May of 1787.

In less than four months under the wise and patient chairmanship of a great Virginian who was to become known as the Father of our Country, these delegates, drawing upon their knowledge of history, upon their experiences under prerevolutionary tyranny and post revolutionary domestic anarchy and international affront, through compromising their strongly expressed, and strongly felt feelings, drafted a document which will forever stand as a milestone in the story of freedom, a document which eventually fulfilled the needs of a new America, a document which British statesman William Gladstone called "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

When Gladstone made that statement he had the advantage of years and history to sustain him. The men of Revolutionary times, however, had only the strength of their faith and determination to guide the Constitution to fulfillment. These brave men recognized that great words alone cannot assure a successful government. Thus when Benjamin Franklin was asked at the close of the Convention "What kind of a government do we have now?" his answer was "A Republic if we can keep it so."

A framework of government carefully designed to protect free people from tyranny on the one hand and anarchy on the other, a government of three separate co-equal branches, a government of checks and balances, if we can keep it so.

The Constitution was boldly designed to preserve and nurture the creed of liberty. But however pure the truths of the Constitution, they are not self sustaining. Laws can only do so much. The writers of the Constitution gave us an outline for preserving the principles they cherished. The rest is up to us, the people of the United States.

In the second generation of our Republic's existence, the French historian, Guziot, while visiting in the United States asked the American James Russell Lowell in what was probably a cynical manner, how long will the American Republic endure? Lowell's answer was "So long as the ideals of our founding fathers continue to dominate." In these words did this great American writer remind the Americans of his generation and of all generations to shoulder the burden of responsibility as citizens of the American Republic, as well as savor the benefits of that citizenship.

And so, like James Russell Lowell, let me remind you, the Americans of this generation, that our prized rights of free speech, free press, and that of dissent are useless unless used. So I urge those with something constructive to say to speak up, those with something constructive to write to print it, and those with something to oppose to constructively dissent. But use your rights, don't abuse them. There may be those who truly believe that our government is bad and our Nation evil, and that the only remedy is verbal desecration and material destruction.

Because of these people and for our own sake, the American citizens, like us, who do cherish our Constitution should speak out and be felt throughout the land. If you love this country, protect it, for it is your God given duty to protect what you love. Speak out for the Constitution, and do so proudly. Be a constructive American citizen.

The Constitution has given us a government strong enough to defend us, to protect us, and yet limited in its authority, thus protecting our individual rights as citizens. Clearly justice will be established, domestic tranquility will prevail, the defense will be assured, the general welfare will be promoted, and liberty will be secured to ourselves and our posterity only to the extent that we, the citizens of today, preserve the ideals of our founding fathers and adhere to the just principles of the Constitution which they ordained and established. The Constitution can fulfill the needs of America only if we the people make it work.

The patriots of this nation's birth recognized the task for men of retaining liberty. They wrote a Constitution to aid in liberty's protection. The patriots of a hundred years later recognized the task for men of expanding liberty. They fought Civil War to preserve unity and extend freedom. The patriots of today face an awesome task for man. They must preserve unity and protect the ancient, delicate and powerful concept of liberty in a modern world.

This is the challenge of our time. This is the torch we carry. This is our dream for the future. Responsible leadership of the free world, staunch support of Constitutional principles and of the laws of our land which implement our Constitution.

Love of our Country, respect for its institutions, vigorous participation in American citizenship, respect for the decisions of the majority while guarding the rights of the minority.

These are the ideals of the founding fathers. These are the principles. These are the traditions of those who gave us "One Nation, under God, Indivisible, with Liberty and Justice for all."

THE TEMPTATIONS: SPECIALISTS IN SOUL

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, some people achieve success and on attaining it soon forget whence they came. Then there are others for whom personal success seems not to interfere with their concern for those less fortunate. It is in this last category that I would place the Temptations.

If there are any of my colleagues who may not be familiar with the Temptations, may I point out that they are the top male vocal recording group in America—specializing in soul music. They are by name—Paul Williams, Dennis Edwards, Melvin Franklin, Otis Williams, and Eddie Kendricks. Under the guiding hand of Berry Gordy, Jr., president of Motown, the Temptations have risen to the heights as indicated by Trade magazine's vote for them as "the world's most successful singing group." They have an enthusiastic following among the young as well as the not so young.

In these troubled times, too often we fail to take notice of some of the more positive things that young people are doing. For that reason I would draw your attention to these five young men who have used their talents and their popularity in a very constructive way. From their humble Alabama origins through formative teen years in Detroit, they have carried with them a concern for others which was apparently instilled in them early in their lives through family training and regular church attendance.

There are few artists that I know who have devoted more of their time and talents to public service. They have committed themselves to at least four benefits a year—netting for civic and charitable purposes over a quarter of a million dollars. Through a scholarship fund which they established in memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., they provide the means for a number of young persons to attend college. They spend a great deal of their leisure time visiting schools in order to stress the value of education and to encourage young people to remain in school. Each of the group has established businesses in the Detroit area which have created jobs and training opportunities for black youngsters. Their involvement is total and sincere, and whether they are communicating with young people on the basketball court, the baseball field, by personal speaking appearances or through their music, the effect has been inspirational to many and appreciated by all.

They have also contributed as ambassadors of good will and understanding in their travels abroad from Asia to Europe. Most recently they were received in London by the Archbishop of Canterbury who had heard of their good works and invited them to meet with him in his efforts to get a better understanding of racial problems and solutions in this country. I understand that this meeting has resulted in a continuing friendship and dialog.

As a Member of Congress from the Detroit area, I have observed these young men moving about in the community giving encouragement, speaking out on pressing civic problems and, oftentimes by just lending their presence, making their concern for a better city and Nation known to everyone. They have become great but have remained humble and loyal to the concept of raising the standards of those less fortunate so that all can participate in the opportunities this country affords. I am proud to be among their fans who are legion. May the Temptations continue to spread their special brand of soul-music and meaningful concern for others.

APPROVAL OF COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL SECURITY

HON. JERRY L. PETTIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. PETTIS. Mr. Speaker, due to a committed speaking engagement, I was unfortunately absent yesterday when the roll was called for the vote on House Resolution 844, to authorize funding for the Committee on Internal Security. If I had been present, I would have voted "yea" for approval of the requested funds required for the operation of this valuable committee for calendar year 1970.

SMILE, YOU'RE ON CANTED CAMERA

HON. ODIN LANGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. LANGEN. Mr. Speaker, lights, camera, action—are the missiles neatly stacked; be sure the men smile as the camera moves in for a closeup; the pounding of pistons and the roar of the sea; screaming jet engines gleaming against the background of a sunny sky; what power. And they do all this for you and me.

The sights and the sounds—what is this all about? Very simple—the Department of Defense is concerned about its image—concerned to the tune of spending over $28,000,000 of the taxpayers' money this past year for public relations activities. Just exactly what are they trying to prove?

I raise this question not because I am "anti-Defense"—there are already too many people around who would disarm this Nation unilaterally; that is their burden to bear.

But I am profiscal responsibility and integrity in Government spending; I am prodemanding a dollar value for a dollar spent; and most important of all, I am protaxpayer. It puzzles me how, in listing national priorities—regardless of which expert is volunteering his views for public consumption—somehow, the taxpayer always winds up on the bottom. I am sick and tired of this—and so are the millions of law-abiding, industrious, respectable, and exceedingly patient American citizens who are increasingly voicing their exasperation at having to finance the ever-expanding and maddening spending schemes and bureaucratic monstrosities which are sapping the very strength of this Nation.

We have all heard a great deal about inflation in recent years—the Defense Department has known more than its share. But in the 10 years since 1959, while the Consumer Price Index has risen 25.8 percent, and the overall defense budget has increased by over 80 percent, the DOD publicity budget has skyrocketed from $2.8 million to $28,000,000—a 1,000-percent increase—now that is really what I call inflation.

So the Department of Defense has concluded it must spend $28,000,000 of the taxpayers' money for promotional activities. One might expect this type of thing from a tobacco company, or from an agency that wants to urge a new "miracle cleaner" on the country, or to remind all children to eat their munchie crunchies for breakfast. But is such a staggering sum of money necessary or justifiable merely to put polish upon our military hardware?

I wish to include in the RECORD an article by the National Tax Foundation—March 1970—which gives a better understanding of the magnitude of this big business operation. I hope each of my colleagues will read it—and be convicted by it. The article follows:

SAY DOD PROMOTIONAL COSTS NINEFOLD HIGHER THAN 1959'S

Spending to publicize the Defense Department's and the armed services' activities has increased nine-fold over that of ten years ago and by recent figures reached $28 million. Congress set a $2.8 million ceiling on such publicity expenditures in 1959—when the defense budget was $43 billion. Between 1959 and this fiscal year, notes Tax Foundation, Inc., the overall defense budget has increased to $79 billion. It will be trimmed a little in fiscal 1971.

To try to halt this rising promotional cost, Sen. Fulbright (Ark.) late last year introduced a bill which would limit such spending. He claims the size of the armed forces increased 36 percent in the 1959–69 period, and the cost of living, 25 percent. Limiting expenditures for promotion and publicity to $10 million, he says would still allow a 370 percent hike over the 1959 spending ceiling.

As of last year, according to the Senator, the activities of the 200 military and civilian personnel employed by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs cost $3.7 million.

In 1969, Navy public relations activities—a full-time staff of 1,086, plus 1,600 to 1,800 part-timers, were employed—cost about $9.9 million.

The Army in 1969 employed 442 military personnel and 170 civilians in "public affairs" activities at an estimated cost of $4.9 million, while the Air Force spent an estimated $9.4 million for similar activities, using the full-time services of 944 people.

Highlights from the Senator's lengthy exposure:

1. Seven pages of the Congressional Record listed films made by Navy;

2. Another 14 pages listed dignitaries, press, etc., taken on trips (on Air Force planes) to AF installations;

3. Another 15 pages listed persons transported to various Army bases. Two pages were used to show the distribution of an Army film, "The Big Picture," over a two-year period. The film cost $902,529.34.

JACKSONVILLE UNIVERSITY TEAM; CINDERELLA SPORTS TEAM OF 1970

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, Poet Berton Braley wrote:

If I should lose, let me stand by the road.
And cheer as the winners go by!

The National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball championships were held recently at the Cole Field House on the University of Maryland campus.

It was my pleasure to witness the Jacksonville University basketball team playing in the NCAA tournament for the first time in the school's short history as a 4-year degree granting institution—the first class was graduated in 1959.

While the University of California at Los Angeles team won—its sixth national title—Jacksonville University's basketball team unified my hometown of Jacksonville, Fla., like no other single group or event in history. All Florida identifies with the winning young Dolphins—they are a symbol of happiness and good feeling because they are the Cinderella sports team of 1970. They lost only two games of 29 played, including a victory over the No. 1 ranked team Kentucky, and one of the games they lost was to UCLA, a winning basketball legend.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to recognize Jacksonville University and its dynamic president, Robert H. Spiro, its 3,000 students, its faculty, 50 percent of whom have doctorate degrees, and its great basketball team, coached by Joe Williams, assisted by Dr. Judson Harris, the athletic director, and Tom Wasdin, and the players: All-Americans Rex Morgan and Artis Gilmore, Rod McIntyre, Pembrook Burrows III, Chip Dublin, Mike Blevins, Greg Nelson, Vaughn Wedeking, Rusty Baldwin, Denny Hawkins, Curtis Kruer, and Ken Selke.

The Jacksonville basketball team did not win the 1970 NCAA championship, but if I may add to Poet Braley's quotation:

If I should lose, let me stand by the road.
And cheer as the winners go by! Because the losers sometimes win too!

Jacksonville University is a winner to its many supporters and new fans across America today.

MISSISSIPPI FARM INCOME

HON. CHARLES H. GRIFFIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 26, 1970

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, 5 years ago the Mississippi Extension Service initiated an ambitious project to increase farm income in our State to $1.5 billion by 1975.

The value of Mississippi products have increased from $926 million in 1964 to $1,099 million in 1969, nearly 20 percent gain despite losses suffered by Hurricane Camille.

Credit for the progress so far must go to the dedicated men and women of the Cooperative Extension Service, agricultural leaders, and cooperating leaders from commerce and industry.

The McComb, Miss., Enterprise Journal recently carried an editorial on this endeavor of Mississippians to expand the rural economy of our State. It follows:

STATE FARM INCOME HEADS TO '1.5 IN '75'

Mississippi has a 10-year goal set in the area of agricultural production which is indicated by the term, "1.5 by '75." This means the aim to expand agricultural production to $1.5 billion by the year 1975.

This program was launched by the Mississippi Cooperative Extension Service in 1965. The fourth year of this 10-year campaign was recently recognized. Between the years 1965 and 1969 farm production went from $926 million to over one billion dollars. The billion dollar mark was reached for the first time in Mississippi history in the year 1967. And it is predicted that the goal of $1.5 billion will be attained by 1975.

Gains and losses about balanced each other to keep the 1969 value of Mississippi farm production at the record $1.1 billion of 1968. Production of meat animals and of poultry and eggs each exceeded $200 million for the first time ever. Forestry also made a big gain. Soybeans, in spite of lower yields and prices this year, are still ahead of planned projections. The values of these major areas equal or exceed the planned projection.

Poor weather pushed the value of cotton below both 1968 and the base year, 1964. The beginning upward climb of horticultural crops was cancelled at least partly by the almost complete destruction of the $5 million tung industry by Hurricane Camille.

Value of milk production continued a slow but steady increase. Food grains and feed crops again declined.

The greatest gain in 1.5 by '75 has been in meat animals. Although good prices helped the meat animal industry, the recent gain represents greater stability and higher quality. Mississippi cattlemen are an important source of feeders for the Corn Belt and other areas. Management aims at making more money from each calf.

The quarterly sales of the 12 feeder pig associations approached $1 million for the first time. These sales add to the incomes of many families on small farms. There are more hog feeders and complete operations with 50 to 100 or more sows.

The continued rise in consumer incomes has brought a strong demand for red meat. Feeder cattle prices in 1970 are expected to remain above those of recent years. Hog prices may decline during the second half of the year.

Some of the latest facts about agri-business in Mississippi are:

Total wages in agricultural related industries climbed from $580 million in 1967 to $660 million in 1968, or 14 percent.

Employment in specified farm related industries rose from 147,000 in 1967 to 152,000 in 1968. This was 41 per cent of all employment covered by the Mississippi Employment Security Law.

Farm production expenses increased from $597 million in 1967 to $632 million in 1968.

Mississippi farmers have $5 billion invested in plant, equipment, and operating capital. This investment will likely exceed $7 billion by 1975.

Credit for farm operating loans is $250 million a year. It is expected to approach $500 million by 1975.

NATIONAL CENTER FOR VOLUNTARY ACTION, PRIVATE SOLUTIONS FOR PUBLIC PROBLEMS

HON. LARRY WINN, JR.

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, Willard W. Garvey, chairman of the board of Garvey Industries, Wichita, Kans., has been appointed to the Board of Directors of the National Center for Voluntary Action by President Nixon. I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues Mr. Garvey's remarks relating to the creation of this unique organization. I commend President Nixon for the establishment of the National Center for Voluntary Action, for the selection of Bud Wilkinson as its president, and for the appointment of an outstanding Kansas citizen, Willard Garvey, to its Board of Directors.

The remarks follow:

STATEMENT GIVEN TO PRESS BY WILLARD W. GARVEY REGARDING THE NATIONAL CENTER FOR VOLUNTARY ACTION FEBRUARY 16, 1970

The National Center for Voluntary Action is a unique undertaking to find Private Solutions to Public Problems. The President of the United States desired to unite the public and private resources of the country in a "creative partnership" to bring Americans together. This national volunteer effort is directed at mobilizing volunteers to help solve some of our pressing social problems in order to enhance the quality of life for all people.

This National Center is a privately funded tax-exempt Corporation in the District of Columbia. It is the private enterprise member of a "creative partnership." President Nixon is the Honorary Chairman of the National Center and Max M. Fisher is the Chairman of the Board of Directors. Eighty citizens representing many different backgrounds combine to create a unified national spirit. The "creative partnership" concept is carried out further by having several Cabinet Officers serve on the Board by virtue of their positions.

(Bud) Wilkinson serves as the President. He coordinates the Voluntary Sector Activities as well as the Cabinet Committee.

President Nixon cited the many valuable ongoing volunteer efforts undertaken by people across the country in his October 1968 speech, "The Voluntary Way." He observed that (a) most problems have already been solved in individual cases someplace, but need to be communicated; (b) there are nearly a million existing voluntary agencies or groups to help people; and (c) a Gallup Poll shows 69 million Americans who desire to spend several hours a week as volunteers to help other people.
